except the old timer will keep bringing it up it might help if you did not distort the context

close it is my real time ability to proces letter dyslexia I have treated the NG to a dmetaration just by posting I prove that those that claim anyone can use Morse Code are incorrrect

that the claim it is just laziness is incorrect

most folks don't need this spelled out for them

I read english prefectly I speak it quite well text is problem as you surely note

not editing makes the point and is easier a twofer

Yes, it very definitely ended - insofar as REALITY of the times is concerned.

I can't speak with life experience about 1908 but, in 1950 I was a Junior in High School and had already fooled around with "radio" in various forms, some WW2 surplus conversions, some homebuilt. 1950 is 56
years ago. :-)

By 1950 many things in "radio" had happened. The military networks had converted to teleprinter for the vast bulk of long-distance communications on HF during WW2 and, with US military now all over the globe, a definite "Cold War" needed quicker comms.
The public had gotten a taste of "on the scene" radio in 1940 with Edward R. Murrow's broadcasts from London DURING the "Blitz." Television broadcasting was exploding in scope and availability of TV receivers all over the nation. The US Army had already proved the viability of using the moon as a reflector of radio waves ("Project Diana" in 1946). US Public Safety radio services were busy converting to VHF FM voice for police, fire departments, ambulances, state patrols. AT&T was busy with the first trials of long-distance microwave relay of television and hundreds of voice circuits on a single microwave link. Single-channel SSB had come into reality courtesy of the new Strategic Air Command's need for reliable long-distance voice communications for their bombers...a different version of multi-voice-channel "SSB" in worldwide use since the 1930s. Metallurgists and physicists were busy trying to produce a new gadget called a "transistor" in quantity, having to invent all sorts of things needed to make them economically feasible. The experimenters in crystal growth were beginning to be successful in making large, pure, man-made crystals of quartz and those methods would also be used in making germanium and silicon ultra-pure later. FM audio broadcasting was expanding under new regulations and a US realignment of allocations above 30 MHz. Standardization of FM stereo broad-casts was still being worked out and the NTSC was being called together again to work out color TV broadcasting standards; the "fight" between CBS and RCA methods had come to an impasse (industry didn't really like either one). Radar was, of course, already proven and was expanding in civilian applications. Raytheon, in some lab trials with old S-Band magnetrons, discovered that one could heat foods with controlled microwave energy and the first of the "Radaranges" had been born (they would - foolishly? - sell that concept and brand name to Amana). Civil airways communications were close to standardizing worldwide on the US military pioneering of VHF communications and radionavigation systems...already given a baptism of fire with the Berlin Blockade of 1948 and the intense Allied air cargo supply effort to keep that city alive. Air to ground radiotelemetry was already being used during tests of new aircraft and was being adapted for missle testing and guidance (using mostly captured German V2 rockets). The old IFF (Identification Friend or Foe) L-band transponder system for aircraft of later WW2 was being improved and standardization for civilian applications being done by a newly-re-formed ARINC. The USN was busy pioneering TACAN at L-band and was having success with that (especially for carrier-based aircraft); TACAN would eventually be adopted for the military and a civilian form, DME (Distance Measuring Equipment) was being tested. Civilian radio-navigation testing of VOR (Very high frequency Omnidirectional Range) was successful, an easy-to-use directional navigation aid that would work in small general aviation aircraft. The maritime world wasn't happy with LORAN so some other systems were being tried out such as DECCA. The USN would eventually prove out the prototype that would become GPSS for the whole world. Up-and-coming UK science fiction writer Arthur C. Clarke (an engineer on RAF work with radar-assisted landing in WW2) had already written up a three-satellite worldwide radio communications relay system in Wireless World magazine and lots of folks were beginning to have deep thoughts about that...no worries about "MUF" or other HF propagation quirks since it wouldn't depend on ionospheric bounce.

In 1950 the ARRL was busy promoting the glory and majesty of the "epitome" of radio communications, on-off keying CW as "vital" to maintain a "pool of trained radio operators" in the USA via ham radio. Oh, and a very few smart amateur radio hobbyists (who were also engineers and educators at their day jobs) were trying to explain SSB theory in the pages of QST. There was great resistance to this new-fangled SSB in the rank and file of amateur brass pounders then, and apparently there still is... :-)

Okay, so it is 57 years later. What do we have in the world of "radio?" Communication satellites are busy working 24/7, their equatorial orbit spaces already FILLED, supplying us with speed-of-light comms over carriers of TV, voice, data, and the part of the international backbone of the Internet. Land-based microwave radio relay is being replaced by fiber optic cable handling digitized anything at GigaHertz rates...under the oceans too. One in three Americans now has a cell phone, a little two-way radio tied into the telephone system, something never really envisioned in 1950 despite the early "walkie-talkies." Cell phones can now contain digital cameras and little calculators, play hours of digitally-recorded sound. All of that enabled by the enormous technology explosion of the solid-state ear beginning about 1960. Digital TV is now a reality, both broadcast as well as cable. We have stereo FM broadcast, even multi-channel audio with "storecast." "Shortwave" broadcasters are transmitting digital audio on HF, something pooh-poohed as "impossible" by certain "radio experts." The old 500 KHz worldwide maritime emergency frequency is all but dead, replaced by Inmarsatrelayed GMDSS...a system conceived and approved by the maritime community. No more dramatic morse messages from stricken ships, now its a quick, almost-anyone-can-use-it data message that will be picked up worldwide. GPS is, of course, a proven reality and many different models of receivers can be purchased at consumer electronics stores. The aviation community is considering replacing the 1955-standardized-worldwide civil airways radionavigation with GPS, possibly a hybrid using microwaves for the approach guidance. RFID is now a reality, able to track everything at store portals and, with implants, animals and people. Private boat owners can add HF SSB to their harbor and inland VHF radio equipment, many models, even some made entirely in the USA (SGC in Puget Sound), no big "test" needed. Almost every long-distance truck operator has at least one CB radio on board and that has been so for decades. Police and fire department personnel can carry VHF or UHF two-way radios on their person for instant communications. In some police departments their VHF and UHF radios have two-way data transmission capability via "computer" terminal equipment in patrol cars. WLANs (Wireless Local Area Networks) have been a reality for a decade, used in large offices and businesses spread over a large area, even in factories (with all their inherent RFI from motors, etc.). Homes can be networked wirelessly. Cordless telephones, once operating solely on 49 MHz, have expanded to the 5 GHz ISM band (once a seeming impossibility a half century prior) and with security through on-line digital encryption. Anyone watching team sports on TV can see the ubiquitous Motorola logo on headsets of coaches, little wireless two-way radios that are similar to the $50 per pair FRS and GMRS handie-talkies sold in consumer electronics stores. The US military has highly secure digital radios (low VHF range up through mid-UHF, almost jam-proof) for small-unit land comms (voice and/or data) and in relay with air and sea support; they've had that since 1989. The military has long had the 225-400 MHz band for AM airborne voice comms and has peripheral equipment to adapt it for secure digital voice and data. Of course, the military has had precision GPS since 1980 (they pioneered and paid for it). NASA has radio equipment for tracking and receiving data (including imagery) from very distant space probes and, in the late 1960s, enabled us to see the first humans set foot on the moon in real time, audio and video. Radio even relayed real-time biometric data from astronauts on their way to and from the moon. US submarines still use VLF radio to communicate while submerged, all using encrypted data (not morse code)...very slow speed data but also very secure and automatically recorded at the ship.

In early 2007 the FCC will finally END the "need" to test for morse code skill to get any amateur radio license. They did this despite the insistence of olde-tymers that one "HAD" to test for morse in order to "qualify" to enter the "service" of US amateur radio. I'm not sure where and what these olde-tymers imagine US ham radio is, but they just don't realize the entire rest of the radio world has long since dropped morse code as any requirement for communications. Amateur radio has always been a HOBBY, nothing more, nothing less.

Morsemanship "vital" to the nation? No way. Morsemanship "necessary" for emergency work? No way. Morsemanship "needed to provide a pool of trained radio operator for national defence?" No way. Morsemanship "necessary" for government licensing purposes? No way, even back in 1990. Morsemanship an absolute must for ham radio? No, that was always a figment of the old morsemen's imagination, implanted there by ancient tales of emotional glory of the distant PAST.

It is excellent that the FCC is finally getting around to modernizing the US amateur radio regulations.

Good post, but I have to dispute a few things in your paragraph. For example, on tests and testing.

In "today's environment" the "students" seem to be about as willing and knowledge-hungry as when I was in high school. [graduating class of 1951...:-)]

To further define that, SOME students cared and SOME students didn't much give a snit, most of those in between varied considerably. I can see the same basic attitudes of invididuals now as back then...if one strips off the veneer of what is/was social behavior
in their peer group. [that seems to cloud many folks observation capability...of those who had a different social environment/mores/ethos].

As a working design engineer for a long time, I've NEVER questioned the "why" of Ohm's Law of Resistance.
It simply WAS. It's just one of the many laws of radio-related physics.

Yes, I suppose I could write up a bunch of stuff on Ohm and the "why" of his "law" since I once HAD to learn that at some instructor's insistence (he never did any design work himself, just "taught", but all had to comply in order to pass his course). In 50+ years NOBODY has asked me about the "why" of Ohm's Law of Resistance. That amounts to hundreds of knowledgeable folks. Ohm's law just IS.

More radio-related is the equation for resonance.
[frequency=1/(2 pi (L*C)^0.5), in units of Hertz, Henries, Farads] The "why" of that? I would have to research it, spend two weeks or so at that, all spinning my wheels on rote work that has NO intrinsic worth. I KNOW it works because I've proved it to myself over and over and over again in actual calculation, construction and test. It is one of those things that just IS. Memorize it, engrave it on the synapses, and go to work USING it.

It is a reliable equation and works every time.

"Ohm's Law" is a very, very simple equation using only three variables and not one single transcendental function. It's almost elementary algebra. To some licensed amateurs it might seem to be "rocket science." :-)

>How bad this is depends on how you perceive the goal of the exam, and >what you expect a newly-licensed amateur radio operator to be able to do.

The material in the US amateur radio test is up to the FCC to decide. The FCC grants the licenses, not the "amateur community." The FCC was never chartered to be an academic organization agency.

From my observation, most of the folks "perceiving
the goal of the exam" are usually working from a base line of their OWN knowledge and experience;
i.e., expecting all to be "as good as they." :-)

>If you perceive the exam as a barrier to entry, it continues to >accomplish that goal. It serves as an indication that the individual >operator should actually know something about radio, that's simply not >happening these days. They can tell you the very specific information >that is covered on questions in the exam, but have no real knowledge of >radio.

Again, the function of the FCC is simply to regulate all US civil radio. The FCC grants the licenses and they have the task of deciding what is necessary for Their test. To save taxpayer dollars, the FCC created privatized testing via COLEMs and VECs. For US amateur radio the VEC create the questions and answers which are then approved/disproved by the FCC. By regulation
the VEC are required to be already-licensed radio amateurs. Presumably those volunteer examiners know something about radio and the general knowledge base or background of those taking license tests. :-)

It would seem more logic to steer the discussion onto the VEC Question Pool Committee rather than to blabber

about What Should Be (or What Should Not). The VEC QPC determine the questions and answers and approval seems to be pro-forma with the FCC. What seems to be the case on that subject in here is merely Word War III
on licensing and an ignition point for yet one more conflagration of the Angry Insistent (on Their way).

>In this sense, the testing and licensing mechanism has changed >appropriately to match the current culture. Why should someone be >required to learn radio theory if they are going to twirl the dial on a >piece of commercial equipment? Rules and regulations, yes. But Ohm's law?

Good question. :-)

One such inhabitant of this Din of Inequity (K4YZ) once stated he "deserved an extra" because of his "ability to tune in a signal!" :-)

>In today's world, the number of people willing to expend that much >effort on a hobby is vanishingly close to zero.

I disagree with that considerably. The expenditure of anyone on their hobby is up to the individual hobbyist.
Being aware of several hobbies done by folks I am acquainted with, such expenditure of personal time and effort varies and none of it is compensated for by anyone but the hobbyist.

It's an old, trite phrase in here that "all must dedicate themselves and work hard" for an amateur radio license, any class. Again, I'll ask "why?" Who is going to compensate those ham radio hobbyists? Will they get cheers and bouquets from their fellow hobbyists for such "dedication?" I think not. At best they would get a few words of approval if in person. In here they would receive yet-another flame war trigger of antagonistic
comment, of allegedly "not doing as good" as the flamer.

This "dedication" thing seems to be an imaginary construct existing in different forms in each individual. Amateur radio is a hobby. It isn't a craft, a guild, a union, or any occupation thing. The hobby is NOT necessary for the survival of the nation nor one whose primary concern is public safety. [like all citizen organizations, they CAN be of aid in emergencies but that is NOT a prerequisite in the amateur radio regulations] Does everyone have to be "dedicated" to something? Or can't they just go and enjoy the hobby without meeting someone else's idea of "standards?"

>There are exactly two >choices -- change the requirements to enter the hobby, or watch the >hobby die. The requirements were changed.

I differ on that. Requirements EVOLVE as I see them. They evolve to fit many, many things but, foremost, I think is that they should fit the present-day and the immediate future.

There was nothing in the Communications Act of 1934 nor the Telecommunications Act of 1996 that mandated amateur radio to preserve and protect the old ways of amateur radio. Nothing about preservation of "tradition." The agency granting all amateur radio licenses in the US exists solely to regulate all US civil radio...it is NOT a "club," NOT some agency beholden to anyone specific or any organization.

The FCC should be responsive to ALL US citizens, on ANY radio service it regulates. For the most part I think they are just that. The FCC and its ham radio license testing doesn't exist to provide emotional sustenance to the olde-tyme ham radio lifestylers who wish to preserve the environment as it was when they were first licensed. That's not evolution, just stagnation in favor of a small minority. That is FAR from "serving the nation," just ordinary selfishness.

OTOH some of the materail is only possible to learn by memorization the band edges, rules. I find the RF safety easy but then I have studied maxwells equation and reconzie element from them but the answer is an arbitary limit set by the FCC

The victim argument!

Let me acquaint you with the pseudo-science that seems to be disabling you:

From the web site
"Adequacy - News for Grown Ups";

"The economic miracle that was started off by Ronald Reagan in the 80s, and continued through the George Bush Sr and Clinton administrations is one the wonders of the modern world. The solid economic base of Amreica, coupled with the explosion of the American designed world-wide-web and Internet have created opportunities for all regardless of education, race, sex or class. Anyone in America who wants a job will be able to take their pick from a selection of attractive and highly paid positions due to the strength of the American economy.
So why is it then that the middle classes have taken to faking diseases and why are otherwise respectable physicians joining in this collective fraud ?

Dyslexia, M.E., Attention Deficit Disorder, Repetitive Strain Injury, Anorexia. You have probably heard of these diseases before. At least one of your co-workers has probably taken time off work for one of these 'illnesses' in the last month. And yet, up until now no evidence has been produced to support the existence of any these afflictions as actual medical conditions. Let's analyse these 'sicknesses' one by one.

a.. Dyslexia. This is the 'diagnosis' given to a middle class child who cannot read owing to low intelligence. It is an attempt to medicalize a problem which in reality is a social one: All men are not created equal. When God gave out the brains, some of us were fortunate enough to be given a shiny new BMW 7-Series sedan, some of us got '97 5.0 Mustang, and some of us (the unfortunate few) got nothing more than an old skateboard.

Dyslexia does not exist. Stupid children who cannot read do exist.

b.. M.E. (also known as the 'yuppie flu'). Again the middle classes cannot stomach the fact that they are not superhuman beings. Consequently when one of them needs to take a day off work, due to being what normal people would call "tired" they medicalize the problem (by giving it a long medical-sounding name) and hey-presto you can get all the time off work you want. Not bad for simply being tired. I wonder what our forefathers who built America by the sweat of their brows would say to a modern yuppie suffering from M.E. ?

M.E. does not exist. People who need to go to bed a bit earlier do exist.

c.. Attention Deficit Disorder (ADD). This one is quite sinister. For thousands of years, children were allowed to be carefree spirits, wandering wherever the mood took them. Investigating a world which is new and fresh to them, getting distracted when something more interesting came along. This was called 'a childhood'. In the modern hell that is middle-class America, a child is not allowed to have a healthy curiosity. No. The moment a child behaves like children have done for thousands of years, the middle class parent reaches for the Ritalin, to dope the poor kid up to better fit with his middle-class golf-playing lifestyle.

ADD does not exist. Healthy childhood curiosity does exist.

d.. RSI. (repetitive strain injury). Another medicalization of a non-medical problem. For centuries it was well known that if you did something repetative for a long time, it could have consequences. Cowboys doing their bit to tame the wild frontier often became 'saddle sore'. Railwaymen laying the tracks across our great continent suffered 'sleeper driver's ear' where the noise from banging in the sleepers to the ground would become too much. In both these cases the 'cure' was simple. Stop what you are doing for a while. The pain would then go away. RSI is supposedly caused by typing. The message to these middle-class whiners who suffer from this pseudo-disease is simple: Take a 5 minute break.

RSI does not exist. People who need a five minute break but are too stupid to take it do exist.

e.. Anorexia (Anorexia Nervosa, also Bulimia). Another disease created as a cover for general stupidity. In the bountiful society of modern America, everyone has as much food as they can consume, there is no need for anyone to go hungry. It is almost like 'Star Trek' where technology has progressed to the point where there is a surplus of all material goods. So why then do teenage girls feel the need to starve themselves ?

Anorexia does not exist. Stupid people who need to get some lunch do exist.

All these "diseases" or "illnesses" have been conjured up from thin-air by the middle class (in collusion with the big pharmaceutical corporations), in order that they can have an excuse to skive off work, or to make them seem more exciting and interesting than their lower-class peers..."

Probably true. More likely, your IQ is somewhat to the left of the peak on the bell curve, that's all. See "dyslexia" above.

Agreed. Many folks do buy into these "afflictions" due to propaganda from the medical and pharmaceutical industries.

>

Well, then you are true to form pseudo-dyslexic; an audio learner, not a visual one. You would not have a problem with Morse code if your IQ were shifted to the right of the curve just a little. Don't worry, it is quite normal to be below average. It is just as normal to not be able to learn the code (a slight left shift from peak) as it is to have the ability (a slight right shift).

Sorry, I did not copy. What is a "twofer"?

I'm assuming that if the applicant recieves question number 32 or 33 that they also recieved number 31?

Yup, that was in the study guide that I looked at.

Is that supposed to be difficult? If you had a basic knowledge of the circuit, you would be able to guess at the part names - if you didn't already know..

Which of course means that the applicant knew what to concentrate on. sometimes I think that what a lot of Hams want is for the test questions to be both very much in depth, and completely random, with the questions produced on-site by the steely eyed proctor. ;^)

Agreed on your point about the increased number of potential subjects to cover in the present day tests. I suspect the only way to reconcile that with your (testing wishes?) would be to concurrently test to the old time depth, with the increased subject matter? I doubt that quadrupleing the number of test questions would sit very well with anyone except those who don't have to take the tests any more.

Don't know if you read the other post I wrote on the subject in a different thread, but I'll repeat it here.

In trying to figure out just where this canard came from, sfter my investigation into why the "old tests were so much harder", I came to the conclusion that they weren't more difficult.

So where the discrepancy?

My theory is that when these old timers took the test, they weren't all that knowlegable. So those tests were harder for them. During their post-test lifetime, they learned more, and became more experienced.

But they forgot that they learned all that stuff, and in the crankiness that middle aged men can fall prey to, suddnely expect that all the new hams should know aht they do now.

I also suspect it doesn't matter. They don't dislike the new hams because they are dumb or less qualified, they dislike new things.

I don't really have any problems with levels of "ability" and goals such as DX awards or contesting. I do have problems with superior hams.

Up for a challenge? Memorize the Extra test, all 800 some questions in the pool. Then let's take a test. I'll give you the test question number, and you give me the letter answer. Since memorization presumably has nothing to do with the knowledge, this should be easy as the new applicants have in taking the so called dumbed down tests

A lot of Technicians I know used the "Now You're Talking" books.
Lots of stuff in there that prepares you for radio operations.

Do you think that most new hams get their license, then hire people

I spent 6 months learning Morse code to 5 wpm, failing my first test.
Aced the other tests.

I respectfully disagree. Since we started a new program to recruit and test new hams (and upgrade old ones) we've been doing at least one a month. We're working well above attrition and the actuarial tables. That's hardly vanishingly small interest.

That's just the start. We have a station for the new guys and gals to use, with a control Op if need be (usually me) to sit with 'em as they get their feet wet.

Wanna know the best way to turn off new hams? Be grumpy and superior. Know for sure that you had a much harder time to earn your stripes than they did. Don't talk to them at club meetings. Make sure they know you're superior, so don't miss a chance to tell em that. With that sort of attitude you'll have a self fulfilling prophecy. Ham radio will die - all around you, wherever you go.

There are so many more possibilities in Amateur radio these days.
Lots of possibilities for test questions. RF safety, spaec station operations. More bands to have those stupid band questions. Seems like a good thing to me.

We often hear (and I believe) that the test is a starting point, not an end. Exposure to the many facets of Amateur radio can only be better than lots of questions about just a few subjects.

we do need (and we hams have in theory) good questions which ARE hard to write and some the questions we have are well stinkers but each pool
I have read sems to be better than the one it replaced

so i suspect our current system is the worst of all worlds for testing except of course for all the others that have been tried (seem to recall that as a quote of someone ;)

Having received a pink ticket from the FCC as a teenager in 1959 for the spurious emissions of a homebrew HF transmitter I think I was more dangerous in those days, even after having passed that 'more detailed' technical General test.

Does it make a difference? Virtually everyone now is running commercially built relatively foolproof equipment (appliances). Chances are way better these days that the stuff is clean even when operated by a non-technical person (most hams).

>I suggest the former would be more valuable

Memorizing the regulations makes sense, but having to memorize the engineering stuff is just plain silly. Especially with no real understanding behind it. Course I'm still operating under a license obtained under Bash... 8-O Service? This is a hobby that on average probably has less technical people than those in the RC model aircraft crowd.

Considering that the FCC lets us build or modify our transmitters, we at least should pass a test to demonstrate that we are at least aware of the responsibilities of not spewing RF trash all over the radio frequency spectrum, messing up the bands for other users.

I doubt if Carl would be interested in attending. His single issue was abolition of code testing, and he WON that back in 2003.

So sorry....I thought you said fertile. What do you want me to terminate? Really, I'm not trying to resist.

This does not compute. this does not computer. The ying collective is futile.

1931. Apology to Mark and Gav

I , Roger Leo Wussman, being of unsound mind and often out of my head, would like to issue a public apology to Mark Morgan for my unnecessary and often mean comments directed toward Mark over these past few years.

I deeply regret posting Mark's home address, his telephone number, and I am very, very sorry for having sent Mark anonymous letters and magazine subscriptions over the names of others. I will never again do this. You have my word on it. And, Mark? Rest assured that the late night telephone calls will cease as of this very moment.

I would also like to take this opportunity to apologize to Mark for cross posting to groups that were innocent bystanders. I was in total error and fully realize that I should not have done so. I will not do this ever again.

And lastly, allow me to eat just one more slice of Humble Pie. I would like to extend a heartfelt apology to Mark's wife, Gav. I went well over the line by accusing Mark's wife of being a Shemale and Transvestite. I now bow my head in shame and humbly plead for forgiveness. If I can make amends to Gav in any way, I will do whatever is necessary to prove my sincerity.

I have my own personal devils to deal with, Mark. I am trying my best, but some of the hurdles are just too great for me to leap over by myself. I'm sure you understand.

I hope you can find it in your heart to forgive me.

The No-Code War Rally will simply change focus now. In another year or so, they'll set their focus on getting the FCC to reduce, or even eliminate entirely, the CW/data portions of the bands.

For most, the No-Code War isn't (and never was) about code testing. It is about destroying a mode they feel, for whatever bizzare reason, threatened (or 'persecuted') by.

You will no more see the No-Code Warriors disappear than you will see the Race Pimps disappear.

That isn't how memorization works.

While there may be some people who "memorize" the question and answer, in reality what most people are referring to when they talk about "memorization" is in fact something more akin to "word association" or "familiarity".

All one has to do is read the question pool enough, or drill long enough using a computer program, that they will "recognize" the correct answer when they see it. They don't actually "memorize" the question pool per se, such that they know the answer to question ### is AAA. No, instead, they simply become familiar enough with it that they can recognize the correct answer to the question, much the same way you become familiar with many things in life without actually "memorizing" them.

When I got my tech license, I used the Gorden West book. That's not how I passed the exams though.

"putting a station" together these days involves little more than calling HRO, unpacking the boxes UPS delivers, and plugging everything in. Not much theory required there.

That's the study guide, not the actual exam.

We really don't know what the old exams were actually like (actual questions), except for the memories of those who took them, because FCC kept them secret. All we really have are the study guides, which are not the same thing at all.

For the General - not the Extra.

In the study guide.

It's not about difficulty at all. It's about what knowledge is needed to pass the test.

Look at my postings and I do not think you will find me saying I think the old tests were "harder" or "more difficult". What you will see is me saying they were better.

Big difference.

IMHO, one of the problems in amateur radio today is too much emphasis on passing the test, and not enough on what to do with it. IMHO, a one-day Tech license course is too likely to produce a person with a license who doesn't know enough about how to get on the air and use the license.

Of course Elmering is part of the answer. And you're looking at the most powerful Elmering tool ever invented. But it has to be used - by both the Elmers and those needing help. Read the various reflectors (much better behaved than Usenet) and you'll see a lot of that going on.

If you had a basic knowledge of the circuit, you wouldn't be guessing.

Part of the old process (not the test content as much as how it was given) was that you only had general areas of study.

That's not my wish at all.

What I'd like to see is more emphasis on the basics of radio (Ohm's Law, basic antennas, how circuits actually work), particularly in the Technician and General exams. Leave the more-exotic, niche stuff for the Extra.

And regardless of what anyone other than FCC wants, both the number of tests and the number of questions for each license class dropped dramatically in 2000.

One more point:

The old Novice was easy to get. Its written was very basic, and so it had a small study guide. But that license also conveyed extremely limited privileges! On top of that, it wasn't a permanent license - you had one shot at the Novice. So there was a real incentive to learn.

Comparing the old Novice to the current Tech is apples-and-oranges.

How "hard" were the old exams? How much did the "old timers" actually know?

Here's one story - you tell me:

Back in the late 1960s, I knew a young amateur who was a Technician. This was in the days when the Advanced had just been reopened for new issues, and the Advanced written test was reportedly the technical equivalent of at least the Second 'Phone, if not the First 'Phone, except for the regulations part, of course.

In those days, those who had both amateur and commercial licenses usually said the technical part of the tests needed to get the Amateur Extra (three exams, General.Advanced /Extra) was at least the technical equivalent of the 'First Phone.

One summer day this young amateur, who would enter 9th grade that fall, went to the local FCC office to take the 13 wpm code and upgrade to General. (No additional written test was needed back then, because the Tech and General used the same written test in those days). He passed, and was about to go home and await his new license, when the FCC examiner suggested he try the Advanced written. (He couldn't try the Extra because of the "time-in-grade" requirement back then).

This young amateur hadn't studied for the Advanced written at all. He knew some radio theory and practice, and the regulations, all of it self-taught. He'd only been a ham about a year or two, but even a 14 year old back then knew better than to say no to The Man From FCC.

So he sat down and tried the Advanced - and passed easily. Not because of some study guide or other, or some memorization tricks, but because of knowing some radio theory and the regs.

So while some may have said they were "hard" and some say the OTs didn't know much, the truth was somewhat different.

Well, I can see why those types of questions are no longer being used. It's more about who is giving the tests than it is about who is taking it.

He is dyslexic. Do you make fun of retards, too? Short bus jokes?

Maybe I'm smarter than the average bear, but most of the time I have no trouble with what Mark is saying. If something isn't clear, I ask for a repeat, and that almost always clears it up. Busting his chops over spelling isn't going anywhere.

With as many years as I've spent overseas and hearing English spoken by Asians, I guess a more practiced in actually trying to understand what people are saying than picking apart what they say. YMMV.

Not sure of your grammer school experience, since you're older than I am, but mine mainly rested on rote-memorization. Vocabulary, math tables, etc.

Besides memorizing that way will lead to certain failure. The questions and answers on the exam are worded the same way BUT the answers are allowed to be in a different order and they are. The reason is to prevent people memorizing the A, B, C, or D.

However, he has explicitly said that it is the reader's sole responsibility to understand the material. This flies in the face of everything that is taught in all English classes. It is the responsibility of the speaker or writer to make the material understandable to the audience.

In addition, he has stated that it is not worth his time to bother to do better as people in here aren't worth it. To me, I can't see why he would even bother to post if the people in his audience aren't worth his time for him to make it understandable.

If it isn't worth his time to do a reasonable job of writing, then it isn't worth the audience's time to attempt to read it.

In addition, I wish to add that it is entirely different than when dealing with foreigners. When a foreigner is less than proficient in English for example, they will follow a consistent pattern of usage that is easy to pick up on fairly easily. The key to it is the fact that the pattern is consistent and is based on their native tongue.

That is because for the material being taught in grammar school, the rote memorization approach is probably the most appropriate. There's really no other way to learn math tables except repetition via memorization.

Yes - but you missed the point, Bob.

In 1976 the tests were all multiple-choice, same as today, except that most of them were 5 choices rather than 4.

But the FCC-provided study guides were in essay format, as given above. The exact Q&A were not publicly available - at least not officially.

How about describing Morse Code skill as an "autistic talent"? I've seen that here. Also "emulating a modem".

Exactly. He thinks his time is more valuable than your time.

As much as possible. Nobody writes perfectly 100% of the time, and some people need more tools than others. And there are some things the available

tools don't fix.

But to refuse to use the available tools indicates a disdain for the audience.
> In addition, he has stated that it is not worth his time to bother to do

I don't remember that exact statement, but I do recall him saying that he didn't use tools like spellcheckers and grammar checkers because they slowed him down too much, and the number and volume of his postings would be reduced.
So he just posts whatever comes out on the first go and leaves it to the reader.

>To me, I can't see why he would > even bother to post if the people in his audience aren't worth his time for

Some folks are more about shouting others down than they are about the truth or logic of what they are actually saying.

> If it isn't worth his time to do a reasonable job of writing, then it isn't > worth the audience's time to attempt to read it.

AGREED!!!!

Years ago I used to try to make sense of those postings. Then I realized that the writer could use the available tools and write much more clearly, but chose not to, because he considered his time to be more valuable than mine.

So I just stopped reading his stuff.

That would require opening the box first. Not going to happen, IMHO.

that might mean we have toomany tests and to much focus on license

First "question" from the 1957 ARRL License Manual for the General exam.

"1. Name the basic unit(s) of electrical resistance, ..."
(etc.)

"The unit of electrical resistance is the ohm."

How is "ohm" not the exact answer? Wouldn't giving an inexact answer have been dishonest?

I remember that he actually did state that the people in here weren't worth taking the time to do it right. I'd have to do a Google search to prove it but he isn't worth my time to do so since we (the audience for his writings) are worth his effort to produce intelligible text.

You were the one who played the dyslexic card to prove the point that not everyone can learn morse code.

Morse code is a policy issue.

This news group is about policy, thus my post was on topic.

However, I do understand that those whose IQ's are shifted a little to the left of the bell curve need a little assistance when it comes to conceptualizing the larger picture.

Here is an example of off-topic:

When researching the pseuo-sciences about dyslexia, you will find that alleged "dyslectics" often have a bed wetting problem, thus capturing a significant number of inherently lazy middle class people and boosting the number of potential insured pharmaceutical consumers;

Do you wet the bed?

True. I would say the vast majority of people who "memorize" the question pools do not actually "memorize" verbatim the questions and answers, but instead simply familiarize themselves enough with the pools such that they can recognize the correct answer on the examination, regardless of whether it appears in position A, B, C, or D.

Granted, certain types of questions lend themselves to 'rote memorization'. Definitions, for instance. An ohm is an ohm is not a watt. Most of the regulations probably also fall into this category as well, as do things like circuit diagram symbols. You just have to "know" where band limits are, and what a NPN transistor "looks like".

I've always been a proponent of eliminating question pools, and instead allowing computer programs to randomly generate question sets. No longer would there be a "where on the HF 80m bands are you allowed to transmit CW?" question with 4 static answers. Instead, the question could have 1 randomly generated correct answer and 3 randomly generated detractors.

Such a test setup would at least ensure that folks taking the test have the requisite knowledge base to pass the test, and didn't simply familiarize themselves w/ the question pool enough to successfully pass the test.

Absolutely...in my observation also. But, an addition:

Some really and truly do NOT like new anybodies. They want to keep their little local "in-group" intact, nice and comfortable, secure with everyone "in-tune" to one another. [see the "No Lids, Kids, or Space Cadets" type or Wince Ficus' "Slow Code" alter-ego]

For many middle-agers, their (sudden?) realization of their own mortality will make new things uncomfortable. They want, desire, and strive for the secure, the comfortable old concepts that they managed to adapt to. I would suppose that's rooted with the #1 human desire of SURVIVAL (sex is only #2). Natural enough.

That age group and that striving for security through keeping the OLD extends all throughout human groupings. It's really a very basic lesson in psychology classes. [I didn't learn it from my wife the retired social worker but rather from two mandatory psych classes for CA engineering majors a very long time ago]

Too many make out like "THE TEST" is some god-awful ordeal or a Battle Between Good and Evil or some kind of cataclysmic EVENT that shakes their being to their core. For some who have been very sheltered that might be true. :-)

I've taken all sorts of "tests" in my life and would rate everyday WORK as being much more meaningful. Produce results according to spec and one "passes" (gets the paycheck regularly). Can't do the work? Maybe not a "fail" exactly but it's a good time to start collecting Want Ads or think about moving into Sales. [Sales doesn't do all that work but they sure talk about how much they do and how good they are...]

>such as DX awards or contesting. I do have problems with superior hams.

Sigh...well, superior anybodies will happen. Those are the "salesmen types" who are selling themselves, fueled by their ego. Some are found in here and there were lots of them in here before. :-) Usually they want to CONTROL things, make order (usually their way), and demand respect from their "inferiors." They can be spotted right away. They won't learn and probably can't understand why most folks just don't like them.

I was questioning the "necessary vetting" and the "time in grade" concept for "advancement" to "higher classes." For one thing, I can't see this whole business of ANY class structure in a hobby activity. If someone NEEDS rank-status-title, let them join a fraternal order that has various grades of "poohbahs" or whatever, wear silly uniforms, and do the "tradition" thing. :-)

The actual operation of a "radio" is usually very easy and any average-intelligence human can learn it quickly. An activity that has lots of jargon attached to it might need some extra hours to memorize all the new terms and how they are used, but the actual operation doesn't take long at all. Comments about "years of service" has always sounded bizarre and absurd to me in a hobby radio activity. :-) Yes, telegraphy skill DOES require a lot of practice but that is a psycho-motor skill really unrelated to operating a radio...and certainly unrelated to knowing HOW a radio works.

I've always said that, to me (and many others I've worked with) radio and electronics is totally fascinating. Ham radio is a good place to get acquainted with that fascination possibility. That hobby doesn't come close to encompassing all that is in electronics, but it's a start. If an individual LIKES the technology, they will naturally seek to learn more about it. NOBODY has to fulfill some kind of artificial "qualifications" test to learn nor are they "inferior" if they didn't get those artificial "qualifications" and be awarded a class-conscious Title of "superiority." Yet there are "superior" beings who strut around Telling others what they should like and what not to like and all should "respect" all those who push others around. Ech. That's NOT what an enjoyable hobby is about...

Nice talkin' at ya Mike, have fun with the mobile antenna project.

It won't be "perfect" unless the Foremost Authority deems Absolutely NOT! I don't bow down and genuflect in front of some dumbshit extra control-freaks demanding Instant Obediance to Their Majesties. Especially the ego-inflated ex-government employee types who spend all their time trying to beat on all others who don't agree with Them.

>He could even apply through the >Vanity Call System and get an old-timey callsign so people would think >he was an old hand at this amateur stuff...

Ha ha ha ha ha. Yes, I COULD do that. But I won't.

I started out in radio "at this military stuff" then
"at this commercial stuff" and never really got around to "this amateur (licensed) stuff." Over a half century ago. Herr Oberst doesn't like that. In fact, Herr Oberst has a hate hard-on for anyone talking against, or anyone NOT following his "superior" orders like HOW It Should Be Done. Herr Robust and his organ-grinding pal, Jimmie NOserve (the one who has a hate memory like an effluent), birds of a feather (who just can't fly very far).

I now regard Heil and Miccolis as in the same league
as Robesin. All that "elite" little group can do is to sit around and hate all those who don't agree with them. All must follow - explicitly - what They Say or be the target of all sorts of character assassination attempts for years and years afterwards. I don't think that is the express purpose of US amateur radio...but those three certainly act like it is in hundreds of their postings in here.

Thanks but I have one. Used it last time to open the boxes that contained a Roomba and Scooba. [wife got her own Christmas present, paid for it by credit card

beyond their cleaning ability to clean up all the shit that those snivelling little sore code-test losers leave in here.

If I need piss-cutters, all I have to do is come in here and read the "superior" postings by code-tested extras extolling their mighty radio pioneerings of the past through dumpster diving and organ grinding.

The ARS is a technical service, alledgedly charged with maintaining a pool of trained radio operators, to provide emergency communications, advance the radio art, contribute to international goodwill, and advance their skills in communications and technical phases of the art.

These purposes are outlined in Section 97.1.

An individual who simply passed the requisite examinations to obtain their license without studying the underlying electronics/antenna/etc theory does not meet those goals.

It is extremely likely that people who pass their examinations using these methods will not continue to increase their electronics or radio knowledge, since they didn't take the time to learn any to begin with.

I, for one, do not think that the ARS needs a pool of appliance operators. Granted, to some degree, appliance operations are going to be a "given" in today's age, since hardly any amateurs build their own gear any longer.

However, if you're looking for a radio service devoid of any technical knowledge, there are many others that fit that bill available to individuals.

Some of these guys wished they were middle aged...

Regardless, either they've spent a lifetime in the industry, or a lifetime as an amateur, and would like to think that everything they know now was on the tests they took 30 years ago. It was not. And they didn't know it back then.

IS THIS THE SAME MIKE COSLO THAT USED TO POST HERE???

Is someone forging your name and email address???

They do like new things when they emulate old things, such as the $350 jewelled Morse Code Keys, and No-Code Technicians like Val Germann who bash no-coders who have no intention of learning the code.

Mark, what I do in the future is MY business. I should have learned that the code-tested extra LOSERS of FCC 06-178 are unscrupulous fabricators of LIES a long time ago. At least
all those that have babbled on in here about my alleged
"promises" and "boasts" of SEVEN YEARS AGO. Especially that transgendered pedantic prissy pansy who tried to make a federal case out of a throwaway line in a newsgroup so many years ago. She never got my knuckles with her spanking ruler. Maybe that's why she was so mad? :-)

"Seven years ago" I would watch my mother die a little bit
every day in a nursing home. [she would pass on in early 2001] I had already converted her old bedroom into a home office and my wife and I were enjoying a newly-rebuilt kitchen make-over (total, including all new appliances) that was just completed. Wife was beginning to assemble a "trip notebook" for a planned sight-seeing, visiting, and 45th College class reunion in Wisconsin in early fall.
Was I really slavering over the promise of a ham call?
I don't think so.

Now, according to the exaggerated FABRICATIONS of Jimmie NOserve, it sounds like I had made some sort of pact with my dying mother, as if promising I would "get an extra out of the box" (if it was the last thing I did). Good grief, the wasy Miccolis went at it, he was so overboard that the USS Nautilus could never find him in a swimming pool!

Did I "boast" anything? No, I think not because, given all the requirements, I COULD have done it, even with a code test. I say "could" because that had a high probability of completion. Much earlier I had gotten up to about 8 WPM (when the minimum was 13) on morse code cognition and I had passed my FCC First 'Phone exam in one sitting at an FCC Field Office. But, "seven years ago," whatinhell was the PURPOSE of spending my own time on bringing back code cognition? To get an AMATEUR radio license so I could "work HF" when I had already done that without a test nearly a half century past? Would it have been to add a callsign behind my name? WHY? Thank you, I was already secure enough in myself NOT to need some fancy-schmansy amateur Titles to boast about or preen or tell tall tales in front of other amateurs. I've had my regular-hours work experience with its attendant titles and business cards. On whatever design task I've done or been assigned to, that work got done successfully.

If I wanted to hear tall tales it was an easy matter to join a local fraternal order and hang around their bar; I'm not a fraternal order member and don't care to spend lots of time drinking. If I wanted to see Moose or Elk or little Kiwanis flapping their gums I would travel to their natural habitat and observe them.

>most hams are not MMM and the MMM are going to be realy busy I suspect

I don't know "most hams" just about two dozen. The three I know best all favor retention of the code test...yet we still get along fine. Come in here, though, and the Mighty Macho Morsemen are so damn "superior" to everyone else that they can leap tall pile-ups at a single bound. They are the "gods of radio" and HAVE NO FLAWS! They are all self-described GENIUSES of English syntax and spelling (if not of the Hunnish language which one apparently writes...even if there was no recording of that ancient tongue)...they are Masters of Correction, or rather "correction carnivores," eager to seize the slightest mistake or typo and shout to the world (that they perceive) that the corrected party is UNFIT for all. They will NEVER admit their own flaws of English and try to put the blame on their accusers if they are caught at it. Is THAT what modern US radio amateurs are all about? If so, I want NO part of it. If so, only masochists would want to join it.

But, as an optimist (not the fraternal order), I think there might be some hope for a FUN HOBBY of amateur radio. Little pockets of activity here and there where a few folks are actually enjoying radio for radio's sake...NOT because some strident (unofficial) "boss" tries to beat them into submission to the "bosses" idea of what they "should" do.

I'm not going to fall for the "bosses" emotional-baggage chastisement of "failing" to get a ham license or any of that bullshit. Thanks but I've had a whole successful career in radio-electronics and its been (and still is) lots of fun in itself. If these "bosses" want to rummage around in their FANTASY of being Gods of Radio as code-tested extras, they can go right ahead making fools of themselves. I can't control them but I CAN try to show them and others how damn foolish they really are.

WHAT are the Mighty Macho Morsemen going to be "busy" about? Sitting around in here trying to spank those who don't care for morse code mode? Calling non-coders names? [they've had LOTS of practice at that] Pretending they are ruff tuff Dill Instructors chewing out recruits? [they've had LOTS of practice at that, too] Most of them seem busy, busy, busy at exaggerating their own experiences (if not telling outright lies). Let them. It's the only "life" they seem to have.

He KNOWS, Brian, He KNOWS...now watch a whole new sub-thread evolve from that...dozens of posts wherein Jimmie NOserve will "show" that YOU are at fault and he is absolutely, totally blameless. :-)

"New callsign?" Which one of my old callsigns is changing?
WRRR? WREX? WMCW? WBEL? KFAC? KMPC?

As far as I know WRRR went out of business. All the others are chugging right along, though. [WRRR was a difficult ID to say
during station breaks...:-)]

But, I digress. All must remember that engine-ear Jimmie done made a "pronouncement" on a "deteriorating" Cushcraft product.
It no good if Jimmie done say it is...and that's that! :-)

Tsk, Tsk, TSK! It also includes FAKING a required mailing address to the FCC attempting to fool them into getting one state's callsign prefix. It also includes FAKING a bunch of "clubs" and gobbling up callsigns for those "clubs," none of which seem to have existed in reality. Roughly a dozen of them.

So, I hope Mikey is enjoying the warm, comfortable weather at his Hawaii "home," a perfect spot for the "RF Commandos" to practice field manuevers!

Hup, too, tree, foah...march, march...beep, beep.

That has nothing to do with WRC-07. There are no ITU requirements for mode subbands. There never have been. So my stetment that I doubt if Carl would be interested still stands. Of course, that's really for him to say.

It is true that there will still be pressure on the FCC from phone ops to widen the phone subbands in the US. This is because the phone subbands are still narrower in the US than everywhere else on three bands - 40, 20 and 15. Some of us want to fix this, but I don't know anyone who wants to go beyond that.

Abolition of mode subbands is just the simplest way to acheive that. In most countries this already how it is, but you aren't likely to hear phone below 7040, 14100 or 21150 respectively. You might hear that in a contest, but often contest rules don't allow any points for those QSOs. If you would rather just widen the phone subbands down to those frequencies that would be just as good as far as I am concerned, but ironically it would probably be harder to get that through the FCC, solely because it is more complicated than abolishing mode subbands altogether.

None of this has ever been about wanting to destroy CW as a mode. you can dit and dah to your heart's content for all I care.

Once in a while he manages to put together a couple of sentences that are not too bad. It's been long time since I bothered to read his stuff. He went through spells when it's not bad and other times when it is gibberish.
Right now I have him blocked.

The next flame wars may well involve the continuation of making the ARS a "classless" service.

People will attack "extra" class and even "general" class; why should those old geezers have HF band segments reserved for them just because they passed a more difficult knowledge test? It is a form of "prejudice". After all, dyslexics cannot take a written test because the letters in the questions appear backwards and the ADD kids are too stoned on Ritalin to study the material properly. What about the people who are truly mentally retarded? What about people with Down's syndrome? Only the old geezers want to have a written test and who are they but a bunch of luddites?

ARRL will eventually petition the FCC to have only one license class. One should only need to pass element 2. We should eliminate elements 3 and 4. After all, Colpitts oscillators are yesterday's technology. Someone will form a lobbying group: NCI will become NKI (No Knowledge International). It will be led by patronizing extra-class license holders who feel guilty about their technical skills and who wish to pass the torch to less knowledgable individuals, some of whom will electrocute themselves as they change the 3-500Z tubes in their newly acquired, used, HF linears.

Somehow, I would have thought the "knowledge" and "code" filters a bit more humane, but Darwinism works too :-)

There will be a call for comments. In 7-8 years, there will be an R&O and the bands will be knowledge-free.

But not without an interminable flame war on RRAP first.

I haven't seen the "autistic talent" remark, however I have used the "emulating a modem" remark. Why is Morse Code Skill not emulating a modem?

True enough. Just after Heil made claims that a person who couldn't spell was incapable of leadership, I noticed a misspelled word in Heils dialogue.

Of course it isn't how it works.

Here is a intereting note.

I have an almost photographic memory. When I studied fot the tests, I would take an on-line test. Any and all questions that I got wron, I hit a book and figured out the correct answer. I read it - usually once, and then I knew the answer. Was I memorizing?

Yeah, Sounds like how mwmory works.

I offered that challenge because I hear so much about rote memory. Some of the curmudgeons are correct in that a person who memorizes the pool is a lot dumber than a person who learns it.

But it doesn't have to. We have the options of putting out a fair amoount of power, and to experiment, and work with equipment of our oown design and manufacture, and to modify that equipment as long as it stays within whatever legal performance limits as apply.

That's what the testing is about. No one is required to make use of all the priveliges.

Very true - a most old fashioned way of teaching.

Some hams won't be satisfied with the testing regimen unless the tests are so hard that no one can pass them.

Actually, he is saying that Cushcraft is at fault. Heil may hold that position as well. Good thing I don't hold stock in Cushcraft as these two just might drive them out of business. Kind of like Robesin and Cushcraft didn't use non-contaminating jacket material?

Would Jim categorize that as a design flaw or defective materials?

It's not the purpose of the ARS, but those three vigilantes have taken it upon themselves to avenge the alledged wrongs that have been perpetrated against the ARS.

I can't argue with that. I'd happily trade all of the space operations and all of the stupid band size questions for some more technical stuff.

In 1956, the Technician test was the General test without Morse

I didn't really study for my Tech license, only a bit for my General, and did indeed spend some time on the Extra. Even so, the tests were not "hard" when I took them.

But I believe that the tests are an entrance test, not some sort of PhD thing. Its what people do after they get them that counts. And I really do like the time in grade thing before getting an Extra license.

There has always been a lot of room for interpretation on essay questions. And interpretation always leaves a lot of room for further interpretations, ie arguments.

That's exactly my point, Cecil! How many ways are there to ask the same questions? Even if we don't use those exact same words, as long as it's intelligible, it's still the same question.

Tsk, tsk, tsk, "young gun." I stated my effort in here years ago, that of just wanting to END the code test. Problem was, NOBODY believed that and they went on and on and on and on about this TERRIBLE MORAL FLAW I had for not getting a ham ticket! :-)

Herr Oberst Heil and his lackey Jimmie Miccolis, they wanted to MANUFACTURE nastygrams about that...so they took things out of context, hammered them in and welded it shut...even though the construct was so out of spec it wouldn't fit anything but their warped imaginations.

Now FCC 06-178 is so close to legal fact of ENDING that damn code testing, those intrepid "radio mis-manufacturers" are crying and whining and snarling at all of us who DARED speak at the FCC about ending the code test. Oh, great big crocodile tears for those radio mis-manufacturers busy making Mt. Everests out of ant hills!

Boo-hoo...they gonna LOSE their big claim to fame as Mighty (Tested) Macho Morsemen. They won't be so damn "superior" anymore!

KH6HZ wrote <nothing worth while>:

Oh, my, Mikey D. is going to ignore the big who-haa in here about his Dirty Dozen "clubs?"

It looks like you were "collecting" OTHER callsigns in 1994. For example, private ship call WCD6729 for the "trawler" named "HORNBLOWER." [ship identification # 526927] Now I suppose that is normally okay except for the required mailing address you supplied:
Deignan, Michael P.
P. O. Box 465
Grapeview, WA 98546

Tsk. Grapeview is a tiny place on one of the innermost waterways that make up the huge Puget Sound. It's about as far removed from Rhode Island as is anyplace in CONUS. You'd have to steam for a couple hours just to pass under the (old) Tacoma Narrows bridge and then it would take lots more hours to get into International Waters.
WCD6729 states that this ship "makes international voyages!"
Ship radio license was cancelled in 2004.

A TRAWLER in Puget Sound, state of Washiington, for a Rhode Island resident? What were you phishing phor?

Now, I can understand your other ship radio license, WCN4898, for the motorboat "EFFLUVIA." [ship ID # MS5499FT] At least your required mailing address was Chepachet, RI. Love that boat's name...so fitting with what you post in here. :-)

Curiosity makes me wonder who gave you that P.O. Box in Grapeview? It was kind of far away from Jeffie Herman's P.O.
Box in Hawaii.

Hey, no sweat, your Effluvia (the boat) radio license was also cancelled in 2004 after ten years. You must have bailed Rhode Island before then, right? But, your effluvia continues.

All these FACTS courtesy of the FCC's own search engine.

That's not much different than a younger brother looking at his older brother's algebra test when studying for his upcoming algebra test. Or fraternity members in college looking at a file of previous years tests (many profs don't bother to make more than minor changes in their tests from year to year). Calculus students can see that there's no point in learning mathematical proofs, as it never shows up on tests. But you better know how to integrate 3csc^4x/((2tan^5x)-1)dx

Heh heh heh, Mark..."man of a thousand callsigns!" :-)

Actually just about 12 ham calls plus a private ship radio license from the state of Washington...considering Mikey D. was a resident of Rhode Island at the time, it is difficult to recognize "residency" in two different far-apart states. He had another ship radio license for a motorboat at the same time, required mailing address given as Rhode Island.

We did a lengthy bunch of posts on "the man of a thousand calls" several years ago in here. Eventually Mikey ran away from here.
The FCC made him give up all his FAKE "club calls." The "clubs" just didn't exist. The last one to die was the one for the "RF Commandos!" :-)

I don't think Alun was in here at the time. He would have enjoyed reading that series of posts, I think. :-)

If a person actually knows the material and how to apply it, nothing is really hard. It's getting to the point of knowing that takes the real effort.

Not just any license, but the Amateur Extra. But you haven't done it.

You wrote here that you were going to get an amateur radio license, Len.
Nobody says it was some sort of promise, nor has anyone fabricated your words. I just reposted a link to what you actually claimed you would do.
But you haven't done it.

> Did I "boast" anything? No, I think not because, given all That's an idle boast in itself, Len. You claim you could have done it, but you didn't.

Suppose - just SUPPOSE - I were to claim that I could have gotten a First 'Phone commercial license at the age of 16, way back in 1970.
Toss in a Second Telegraph commercial license, too.

Would you accept that as having a high probability? I think not. Even though
I probably could have done both.

> Much earlier I had gotten up to about 8 WPM
> (when the minimum was 13)

The minimum Morse Code speed for an FCC-issued amateur license stopped being 13 wpm in 1951. After the restructuring of 1951, it was 5 wpm. Soon it will be 0 wpm.

> on morse code cognition and I had

So what? None of that means you could pass the FCC exams for the Amateur Extra
in 2000. Or in 2001, 2002, 2003, 2004, 2005, 2006 or 2007. Claiming what you could have done in the recent past based on what you allegedly did in the distant past sure sounds like idle boasting.

Tell us, Len. Tell us your actual motivations.

btw, an amateur license is more than a callsign.

If you don't want such a license, why did you write that you were going to get one?
Not just any license, but the Amateur Extra. But you haven't done it.
Why say you were going to get something you really don't want?

Len, we've all seen you "boast about or preen or tell tall tales" here without an amateur license. Heck knows how you'd behave with one!

You mean like folks who were never actually on the receiving end of an artillery barrage, but who tell what it's like, based solely on the words of others?

Or folks who bitterly oppose changes to, say, zoning regulations in their own neighborhoods (aka NIMBY), because such changes may affect their 'enjoyment', but then insist on trying to change the rules

Do they know how you behave here?

Would they tolerate it if you addressed them they way you address those who disagree with you here?

Perhaps your definition of "getting along fine" is that you don't physically assult each other?

Isn't that exactly what you are doing, Len? You're really describing yourself and your behavior here!

Was your "out of the box" statement of seven years ago a mistake in English syntax, Len?

What is a "throwaway comment", Len? You've described some of your own words that way - does it mean you write things here that you don't really mean?

It seems to me that what you really want is to simply rant and rave at those who disagree with you here. You want to carry on in a very immature fashion, yet never have your own words or behavior commented on or tossed back at you.

You want to claim that others have written and/or done certain things without ever providing any evidence, but then get all upset and nasty

when evidence of your own behavior is provided.

Classic "do as Len says, not as Len does" behavior.

Well, it doesn't work that way.

> Is THAT what modern US radio

Don't you know, Len? You claim to know all about amateur radio - now it turns out that you actually know only about a dozen amateurs.

Actually, Len, there are large numbers of radio amateur's actually enjoying "radio for its own sake" on the amateur bands. Including me.

But even though you are not one of them - not part of that neighborhood - you want to change the rules for it. And not just about the Morse Code test.

How is that any different from an outsider trying to change zoning laws in your neighborhood?

> I'm not going to fall for the "bosses" emotional-baggage

Who are these alleged "bosses"?

Why did you say you were going to do something if you did not intend to do it? If you really could do so, as you claimed, was there really no time in the past 7 years? Your postings here prove you had plenty of time to hurl insults at others.

> Thanks but I've had a whole successful

Then why are you posting here so much? Some of us have a stake in amateur radio policy, because it affects us directly. You don't. You're not the FCC, either.

Perhaps the foolishness is in bothering to read what you write.

"Spank"? How?

> Calling non-coders

When have I called here anyone names, Len? You're the one who does that. Heck, you can't even call those who disagree with you by their first names or callsigns - you have to make up insulting nicknames for them.

There's a challenge for you. Try addressing everyone here by their first names
and/or callsigns only. Not by insulting nicknames, last names, etc.
Just first names and/or callsigns. Can you do that? I think not.

How about someone who insists on knowing what others do for a living, their family situations, their education, military/government service, and much more stuff unconnected to the subject of this NG, so it can be used as a basis for insults?

Why are you so upset and angry, Len? All I did was to post a link to something you wrote.

Is that not allowed? Is there a statute of limitations on newsgroup postings?

At some level, yes.

You either memorized the process/algorithm/information required to properly process a question of the nature you missed (for example, a resistance computation), or you simply word-associated/familiarized yourself with the question pool enough that you recognized the correct answer when you saw it.

In the first case, you engaged in the process which virtually all people go thru to learn a new skill, etc. (certain base memories have to be memorized, i.e. formulas, definitions, etc.) This isn't a bad thing. It forms a basis from which you can then build upon the knowledge.

In the second case, all you did is word-associate the answers, without any real understanding of the theory behind the answer. This IMO is a bad thing, and isn't what we should be promoting with our licensing examinations.

> I offered that challenge because I hear so much about rote > memory. Some of the curmudgeons are correct in that a person > who memorizes the pool is a lot dumber than a person who

I can't say whether a person who word-associates the pools and manages to get a license is more or less intelligent than someone who learns the material (i.e. someone with a photographic memory could also be rated as a genius from an IQ perspective.) All I can say is that, IMO, the type of person the ARS should be striving for is the person who learns the underlying technical material to pass the examination.

I know very, very few people who build their own gear these days. Probably the only thing I've seen someone build in the past 3 years is a QRP transmitter and a dipole.

> That's what the testing is about. No one is required to make > use of all the priveliges.

No, but testing should ensure that the applicant actually knows the material they are being tested on. The current structure of the theory examination testing does not accomplish that.

My complaint with theory testing has never been about the material being tested, simply the presentation, as the current tests do not actually ensure the applicant knows the material.

Despites claims in another thread, I do not wish to "make the tests harder", although I'm sure that my ideas would probably result in a higher failure rate, since applicants would actually need to know the material, rather than word-associating the correct answers.

To some, mainly, those looking for a free-ride anyway, this is likely to be viewed as "making the tests harder", just as I'm sure they would claim the existing tests are too hard for a myriad of reasons, all of which really boil down to the fact they simply cannot sign their name to a form and instantaneously receive an amateur radio license.

Oh, I think it will go much further than that. The case will be made that the FCC could significantly simplify its administrative tasks by
(1) completely dropping most testing, (2) allowing only type-accepted radio equipment on the bands (not just amplifiers), and (3) combining the ARS, the FRS and the CRS into a unified hobbyist service.

I'm finding myself agreeing with you about this. It seems that a lot of folks are "memorizing" the test questions and not mastering the material. There are a lot of places where one can go take "practice" testing that uses the exact question pool for any test you want to take. Given the number of questions in the pool, it's not impossible to memorize just the questions and not know the concepts.

I'd argue that this is very short sighted so one wonders what the solution here is... I suppose we could increase the question pool by 10 fold or so and make it easier to learn the material than memorize the questions?

Just so there is no mistake here...

I morn the dropping of the code from the testing requirements, more from a nostalgia perspective than a practical one. I understand the reasons and arguments on both sides of the debate, and I understand and agree with the reasons it was done.

first way to go for an Ontopic post

one you are right the FCC will likely eleimate more testing as it closes down another license class or 2
but it seem unlikely that the fcc will ever try and get the genie back into the bottle and try to enforce a rule on type acceptance of for the ARS

three back to your whining about CB services give it up

It is by law, Part 97, the "Amateur Radio Service".
That part cannot be argued. The "service" that is performed is by the federal government for the benefit of US citizens.

It also meets the definition of "hobby". It is not a choice of either/or. It is both.

Which Part 97 rule did I violate, Morkie? I don't seem to ever recall getting a pink slip from the FCC telling me I've violated Part 97.

Where have I stated code testing weeds out anyone?

Well... For years it weeded YOU out... so that certainly was a good thing,

I've been stating this very thing for close to 10 years now.

It is important to put "memorize" in quotes, because (as others have mentioned) it is highly unlikely someone memorizes verbatim the question and exact answer. More likely what actually happens is people become familiar enough with the question pool after drilling long enough that they simply recognize the correct answer -- no real "memorization" per se of the actual question or answer. Much like the same way you become familiar with, say, streets along your daily commute, even though you probably do not have a map memorized in your head.

> I'd argue that this is very short sighted

It is, IMO, very short sighted, because people who pass the examinations using this method do not, IMO, meet the goals of the ARS as outlined in 97.1

> so one wonders what the solution here is... I suppose we > could increase the question pool by 10 fold or so and make > it easier to learn the material than memorize the > questions?

My proposed solution is to eliminate question pools entirely, and instead have a computerized question pool which is entirely randomly generated based on various parameters. For example, take this question from the Tech license:

T7B10 (B)
What is the satellite sub-band on 70-CM?
A. 420 to 450 MHz
B. 435 to 438 MHz
C. 440 to 450 MHz
D. 432 to 433 MHz

Now, rather than having 4 set answers, why couldn't we simply have a computer program generate the correct answer and 3 distractors automatically?

Some people have argued that my idea makes the test too "hard", or makes it appear as a "graduation exam".

From the perspective that the exam is harder, that is probably true. You would actually need to know the material, rather than simply become familiar enough with the question pools to pass the examination.

However, in no way do I support (or suggest) that we make the examination "harder" from a material perspective. If an applicant is supposed to "know" ohms law on an examination, is it too much to ask that they really demonstrate they "know" it, rather than simply "know" what the answer to the question is, with no real understanding of the theory behind the question?

Like Cecil once said... The examinations are not supposed to be graduation exams, nor do I support any type of proposal to make them more difficult, from a content perspective. My suggestion, however, which I've posted for at least 6-7 years, is to simply make the question pools computerized to eliminate the ability of applicants to "memorize" the Q&A's, and ensure that applicants actually know the material they are tested on.

it is short sighted I agree but how was your 12 club calls anything but a violation of the intent of that same part? it wasn't

people are allowed to be shortsighted

OTOH I doubt anyone can USE ham radio without learning something about it

Hello All,

I was about to take my "tech" exam this coming Saturday, which I was really looking forward to doing. I have been interested in radio for some 45 years; the last few months, hams buddies have encouraged me to finally do something about not waiting a 46th year.

I went to the ARRL's site here:

http://www.arrl.org/fcc/uls-qa.html

My first and immediate concern was that I had to supply my SSN in order to apply for a ham license. Why? It is part of the "Debt Collection Improvement Act" of 1996. What possible debts would be incurred by me becoming a ham, that the FCC would need to utilize my SSN to collect? Failure to renew my license!? Did I have an option?

What appears below is how one of my ham buddies explained the matter to me...

"When you register in the ULS system it will assign you a Federal Registration Number (FRN) that you can use instead of your SSN.

Also, you will automatically receive an FRN when, as a new licensee, you supply the VE team with an SSN. The FRN is printed on your new license."

This is the link for the ULS. You can receive the FRN from this site

https://svartifoss2.fcc.gov/coresWeb/regEntityType.do?btnContinue=true"

But, the problem still exists! I am not calling into question the honesty or integrity of the VE's or the ARRL, at all! That is not the reason for my concern. In order to register with the ULS [and apply for a ham radio license], you've got to submit your correct SSN number. My concern lies with the necessity of giving out my SSN to another government institution that cannot guaranty its confidentiality or safety. Just last year the Veterans Administration notified 26 million vets that their data, including SSN's had gotten "lost".

Getting into the registration for the FRN, several questions later I am asked for SSN in order to receive a FRN! This makes no sense to me at all! I am not applying for employment, a mortgage or a loan of any kind. I would be willing to offer a birth certificate, my drivers license, my passport, as well as my COSTCO card [hi-hi] as ID. After all, the federal government already has my SSN in a multitude of ways.

Apparently, I was misinformed. Yet, my SSN card specifically states that, "This card is not to be used for identification purposes".

I am planning to write to the ARRL & the FCC for some guidance in this matter. If, however, there is no way to register with the ULS without submitting my SSN, I will need to rethink, deeply, just how much becoming an amateur radio operator fits into my life.

Many thanks for taking the time to listen! It was not my intention to take out my frustrations on you! I apologize, if I have inadvertently done so!

I would very much like to hear your views on the matter.

Is my concern really misplaced or even unwarranted?

Alan

I don't like it as I suspect that MY SS was compromised through the VE

it is s ign of the times one I find distrubing esp everytime I see the

I doubt it. That would just be being vindictive. If some hams want to use CW, have at it, enjoy. Just pick a frequency consistent with band plans and not in use.

The FCC likes hams, and most hams want the FCC to do their enforcement.
Hams, for the most part, are well behaved compared to most of the other radio services. So the above will never happen.

Normally you might supply your SSN to your state when you apply for a drivers license, or supply it to your doctors office when you first fill out paperwork, etc. What guarantees do you have that they won't be hacked somehow?
I wouldn't give it a second thought, the state has it, the feds has it (maybe you applied for a Federal Gun Dealers Permit - or maybe you applied for a job somewhere that has security clearance - or maybe you have served in the armed forces, etc.)

Alan,

I absolutely 100% agree with the sentiments expressed. So does the ARRL, and probably the majority of licensed amateur radio operators.
No, you don't have an option if you wish to obtain an amateur radio license, unfortunately. Even though the FCC publicly tracks licensees with the FCC Registration Number (FRN), it is still mapped back into an SSN in their non-public database, as you note. The FCC is following the letter and intent of the above-mentioned Act. Hypothetically, one might owe debts to the government in the form of unpaid taxes, or be liable for child support (previously a state matter, now federalized under this Act). The government wants to be able to better track such individuals, and withhold licenses or fee refunds from them. However, such an overreaching Act does not take into account the record-keeping burdens and potential for privacy violations that may be out of proportion to whatever benefits may be obtained. Applying this Act to amateur radio licensees, though lawful, strikes me as one of the least beneficial circumstances relative to the costs.

Even more disturbing is the results of an annual government privacy and security report card given by Congress, based on Government Accounting Office findings:

http://www.house.gov/list/press/fl02_boyd/6_27_06_pr_va_data_security_nicholson.html

The FCC isn't listed, but I doubt that it would get an A+ under this grading system. The average grade over all agencies, as of 2005, is a D+.

The ARRL will point out that they did petition the FCC, giving many of the arguments that you just did (privacy invasion, unwarranted and costly collection of information relative to any possible benefit, etc.) and were rebuffed. If the FCC replied to you at all, they would just point out that they are following the laws passed by Congress, and as written.

Like many hams, I was faced with the decision at renewal time whether to give the FCC my SSN, or give up my ham radio license. I didn't want to give up my ham radio license. Furthermore, I don't think that mass refusal by hams to give SSN's, and thus give up their licenses, would alone solve the problem. It might instead do great damage to the Amateur Radio Service by significantly reducing the number of active hams who are knowledgeable of, and active in, regulatory politics. It would also prevent individuals like yourself from enriching our hobby by your inclusion as a licensee. I do hope that you will reconsider.

I don't think that the situation is hopeless. The weaknesses of computer security at many government agencies, and the poor choice of the SSN as both an identifier and authenticator, are clearly both coming to a head, and may have better political/legislative solutions, hopefully within our lifetimes.

2069. ARRL, crimes against humanity, human nature and human depravity ...

Newsgroup: rec.radio.amateur.policy
Date: 2007-01-22 22:03:58 UTC
From: John Smith I <assemblywizard@gmail.com>
Message-ID: <Pwath.15$7K.170106@news.sisna.com>

To Whom It May Concern:

For decades now amateur radio has been a closed club. It has been relegated to the technical minded and the religious minded (ARRL, brass pounders, good-ole-boys, etc.) This has been no less than a crime against humanity and shows a base, self-serving and progress-holding-back-mentality of the individuals who have perpetrated this "crime" upon humanity. They smack of lack to the right to even be called human.

Now, you might ask, "How can you substantiate the above?"

My reply would be, "EASY!"

Now, let me explain, we here all know the power of the internet. We know the importance of the internet. I think few will dispute that the internet will change humanity (you might also dispute if all the changes will be for the better.) We communicate here in a free, uncontrolled, idea-sharing and democratic way--owing to its' creation and proper development.

Now, compare the internet to amateur radio. I think amateur radio could and SHOULD have made such changes decades ago. Amateur radio has the power to allow humanity to communicate worldwide. Amateur radio could have allowed members who where math inclined and could have made the same contributions to data encryption, data compaction, and data transfer that the internet did.

So, what is the real difference between amateur radio and the internet? It is the people, that was and still is the major difference. Small, self-centered, self-serving, protectionist, criminally-minded and just-generally-unsavory individuals seized control of amateur radio and controlled its' destiny.

Now I say, "Let us remember the names and calls of these individuals well who have so greatly influenced amateur radio, where amateur radio has gone and what amateur radio has become. Let us recognized their vast damage, lack of intelligence, lack of caliber, lack of integrity and just-general-small-man-mentality which they have so well demonstrated."

Yes, let these men now go down in history for what they were, what they did and what they still remain ...

Beware! They still lurk amongst us. BEWARE! They now attempt to "shape-shift" and change into "little helpers" which appear to be "angels-of-light", let us hope the rein of their damage will finally end and men finally see them for what they have been, are now and will continue to be in the future--LIARS and CHARLATANS!

Respectfully,
JS

From the same perspective, I think that all hams should be required to re-test on a regular basis to keep their ham license. Afterall, that is what they do with driver's licenses isn't it?

You know, if we came up with enough ideas, we could probably open up most ham bands to business interests and they don't have to take a test at all.

On the other hand, we could identify what the critical tasks a ham operator needs to operate, tell the prospective ham what those tasks are, give the prospective ham the answers to those tasks (such as a question and answer pool) and then test on those identified objectives. After the new ham gets his license to get on the air, we could provide him with a learning environment to enhance those basic skills and become a more experienced and adept operator.

Me, I go for plan "B."

Yeah, but then there were all those "unofficial" question pools. The same thing is done with the "General Contractors" exam here. For a fee, you can know what questions are on the various exams and hence have a study guide. Whether it's sanctioned or not, it would still happen. I'll bet that the truth be told, there were some underground copies of test questions available even back then. You know, if everyone in the club came back an just wrote down the questions that they remember, it wouldn't take long to cover over 90 percent of the pool of questions.

Giving the study guides in essay format and then testing multiple choice gives the test writer a lot of leeway in how the questions are worded. Some people get off on writing questions so that the test is not so much on your knowledge of the subject as it is about your ability to read carefully. The reason that it worked back then was because the tests were administered by the FCC and had a lot more oversight than todays test administrators do. The only real soulution would be to provide an accepted pool of test questions that would be approved to be on the tests. However, then we come back to how those test pools would be available for a price after a while.

Now, a better question would be, if the current test procedure produce operators capable of functioning at the minimum entry level for that particular classification of ham, why would we feel compelled to change it? Bear in mind, I'm not opposed to proposing a change to the testing method provided there is a tangable benefit to it beyond simply making it harder to get a ticket.

That is exactly my point. It leave the person grading the test a lot of lattitude. It also gives them real big headaches.

Robesin appears to be self-destructing (finally). He is centered around insulting Mark Morgan and he has lost his ability to even touch on amateur radio subjects.

Heil and Miccolis are both braggarts who never go into much referencible fact of what they've done in radio (other than showing a '70s frankenbox). Both are judgemental as hell about everyone else, yet turn a blind eye to fellow morsers.

My wife has worked at that (Illinois, with a Masters in Education) for several years, mostly in regards to US History.
It's a difficult task given the wide span of students' ability to write and express themselves. Ask any teacher or college instructor and get - more or less - the same answer.

Since 1934 and the Communications Act, the FCC has never been chartered to be an academic institution or organization and,
as far as I've been able to find out, FCC field office officials have never been required to hold any degrees or certification in education as part of their jobs. Essay ANSWERS generally require a goodly part of time in just trying to understand what the test-taker wrote for any answer. Much, much more time than pulling out an answer template to lay over a multiple-choice answer sheet. [such answer templates are in wide use in most all government agency testing, not just in schools and colleges]

The one bit of good advice I got in 1956 for my First 'Phone test in Chicago was: "Be clear in your writing, concise and legible." Even for the few schematics that had to be drawn.
No sweat, even with the government-issue #3 lead pencils we had to use. I printed my answers to be sure they had a minimum of handwriting-interpretation tasks. :-) I passed.

The law's requirements for VEs doesn't require ANY of them to possess academic certificates or college degrees nor experience in test-giving and test-grading. Privatization of ALL radio operator license testing (commercial as well as amateur) pretty much dictates the easier-to-grade multiple-choice question-answer format. Certainly so for the all-volunteer amateur radio test coordinators.

I agree a much better question don't expect an answer from jim though and yes if I am shown a better method that will work at least as well etc and serve th interest of the public and the ars i will be all for it but on the scale of how hard the test should I want the number to be 1.0 enough units if that can not be assured Id rather have the test be 0,9 enough units than 2 or more enough units

Welp, putting dictionaries aside, I rather prefer the FCC's own definition of the word "service" in regard to ALL of Title 47 C.F.R. (of which Part 97 is one of the smaller Parts):

"The word 'service' is a regulatory term, denoting
a type and kind of radio activity being regulated."

All throughout Title 47 is found the word "service"
such as Private Land Mobile Radio SERVICE, Aviation Radio SERVICE, and (gasp!) Citizens Band Radio SERVICE! :-)

>It also meets the definition of "hobby". It is not >a choice of either/or. It is both.

Ahem, that's an interpretation. I prefer what the FCC itself uses in regards to definitions...and also note that the FCC is chartered by Congress to only US civil radio. Military SERVICE is governed by the Department of Defense and military radio use is done in cooperation with the NTIA. By law, the FCC cannot regulate military radio service.

One problem with so many amateur licensees is their imaginations leading them to believe (wrongly) that their (defacto) hobby is a form of "national service"
just by being federally licensed. That imagination makes them think they are more than just hobbyists.

They reinforce that by boastfully pointing to their volunteer efforts in helping their communities. In truth, ANY citizen can volunteer to help their community (in or out of emergency situations) without any "license" of any kind. That's called "civic duty," sometimes "civic responsibility."

I've nothing against anyone pipe-dreaming or doing the wish-fulfillment dreaming. However, such fantasy role-playing should NOT be codified in law NOR be some kind of "definition" which is really a grossly-distorted interpretation. Politicians are constantly reinforcing such pipe-dreaming and fantasy role-playing by proclaiming the "goodness" and "nobleness" of ALL KINDS of activities. But, those proclamations are just the usual political bullshit done to favor certain groups and get the politicians' names into public media.

US amateur radio is basically a HOBBY, a radio activity of NON-pecuniary compensation, forbidden by law to be a broadcasting service. It is regulated by charter of the Congress due to the nature of laws of physics and the propagation of electromagnetic waves...something that applies to ALL radio, not just amateur radio.

>For the record, my Ship License was WCN4898, not WCD6729. Anyone with half a >brain can check the ULS and see the FRN on my (expired) ship license.

Are we to assume that "coincidences" justify attempts at "legally" defrauding the US government?

Ship radio license WCD6729 was granted 1 Feb 94, no FRN given,
FCC required mailing address given as Grapeview, WA, 98546.

Ship radio license WCN4898 was granted 13 Oct 94, FRN given as 0003639002, mailing address given as Chepachet, RI.

Both ship radio licenses expired in 2004.

Both ship radio licenses were granted to "Deignan, Michael P."

Based on long-ago "discussions" about club callsigns in here - and on such places as the AH0A amateur statistics -
"Deignan, Michael P." had OVER 10 amateur radio "club" licenses at one time...PLUS having given his "residence" address to the FCC as a Post Office Box in Hawaii, not only for those alleged "club" calls but also his own Vanity license application. Was "Deignan, Michael P." EVER a RESIDENT in the state of Hawaii? Residency is not defined as temporarily staying there as on a vacation.

"Deignan, Michael P." isn't a common name. Are we to assume that there is more than one Deignan with the same given first name and middle initial in the USA? I think not. The names and dates all point to a single individual.

FCC ULS data show that "Deignan, Michael P." prefers Post Office Box "addresses," regardless of state. That's called a "tell" to investigators. A common characteristic of those seeking to hide something. Anyone with a full brain can see these alleged "coincidences" aren't quite so coincidental.

Now, I could go into the collusion you had with Jeffrey Herman on your KH6 vanity callsign...but that has already been done and you've been forced to give up your "club" calls by the FCC. Tsk, tsk. The mighty "RF Commandos" were mustered out and the VA offers them NO benefits.

It's rather obvious also that you refused to give an explanation for taking out so many "club" calls or the misleading "residence address" of Hawaii for you vanity callsign. [a KH6 must be oh, so tres chic in New England area, much better than a plebian KD1 like your previous license of KD1HZ, another vanity call]

I have neither "yellow stickys" nor acoustic modem.

Tsk, tsk, an amateur extra betraying Miccolis' boast that all pro-coders are "polite, civil" people who never utter personal insults? Yes, they DO exist as proven by the quotes above.

I have no "visiting nurse" and do not use or wear "diapers."

Exactly - you may not even consciously know the street names, but you know
the route.

Here's another "memorization" example:

Way back when "Trivial Pursuit" first came out, somebody gave me the game as a present. I kept the card sets out and carried a small bundle around with me. I'd glance at them at odd moments - waiting for/riding the elevator, during TV commercials, while waiting for the washer or dryer to complete a load, etc. In a relatively short time I had gone through the first box of cards twice.

I didn't try to consciously memorize the questions and answers on the cards, I just read the questions, tried to guess the answers, and then looked to see if I was right.

The end result was that I was near-unbeatable in a game if they started with the first box of cards. I hadn't really "memorized" all the Q&A, or even most of them, but having seen them before put me way ahead of most other players.

> > I'd argue that this is very short sighted

Perhaps, but that's not the big issue.

What I see as the big issue is that such testing may actually do a disservice to the amateurs themselves, because they wind up with a license but not the basic knowledge on how to set up a station and operate it.

Because that wouldn't help the situation at all - at least not in the above example.

First off, a regulations question is essentially a memorization question. A Ph.D. in EE, a pile of patents and the Nobel Prize in physics won't help a person answer that question if they don't know the relevant rules in Part 97.

Second, if the exact questions are publicly available, figuring out the correct answer is pretty easy. Then all the person has to do is "memorize" the correct answer enough to recognize it. Changing the distractors doesn't make any difference. In fact, if one intends to "memorize" the pool, the first step is to blank out all the distractors and only look at the right answers!

Where such an approach would have an effect would be in questions like Ohm's Law, where the values could be randomly generated.

Maybe not. I think that, in the long run, it is actually easier to learn the material.
It's the short run that is the problem.

Agreed! The issue is not how "hard" the tests are, but how good they are.

Agree again!

In practice, however, not much can be done other than to enlarge the question pools and possibly have computer randomization of values. The FCC is clearly not going to take over the testing jobs that have been done by unpaid volunteers for more than 20
years.

Who said that, Len? Give us a direct quote, please.

Not proven at all, Len. In fact, when you argue with Mike,
you are arguing with a nocodetest person.

You have obviously forgotten that KH6HZ is, and was,
against the Morse Code test for an amateur license.

This isn't a new thing, or a secret. Look up his 1998 comments to the FCC on the subject, if you don't believe me.

He specifically asked FCC to do the following in response to NPRM
98-143:

1) Reduce all Morse Code testing to a single 5 wpm test, but only because
the treaty then in effect required some sort of test

2) Include a "sunset clause" that would automatically eliminate that test when
and if the treaty changed, without any further NPRMs, petitions or other actions being required.

IOW, he supported the NCI proposal of that time! He's a dyed-in-the-wool
no-coder!

He also suggested:

3) Reduction of the number of amateur radio license classes to two.

4) Changes to the written test methods (not the content as much as the test methods).

This was almost ten years ago. I don't think Mike has changed his

Nobody believes your claim of "just wanting to END the code test"
because
your behavior proves otherwise.

You do want to eliminate the Morse Code test. But you also want a lot of other things in amateur radio to change, such as eliminating anyone under the age of 14 years from being a licensed radio amateur, even though you can't provide even one example of a problem caused by the lack of a minimum age requirement.

There's a lot of other things you clearly want changed, such as eliminating vanity calls, eliminating multiple classes of amateur radio license,
etc., but you only admit to the Morse Code test thing. That's a clear contradiction to
"just wanting to END the code test".

And it's why your claims aren't believed.

You talk the talk but don't walk the walk. Then you get all bent out of shape because some points out the facts - as if they are wrong for doing so.

> they wanted to > MANUFACTURE nastygrams about that...so they took things out

How was your claim of seven years ago taken out of context?

You wrote that you were "going for Extra right out of the box".
Pretty clear then, and pretty clear now. The whole post is still in the archives - I posted a link at the beginning of
this thread.

I have yet to see anyone explain how the context of that posting changes the obvious meaning.

Len, nobody on rrap cries, whines, snarls, or sheds crocodile tears nearly so much as you do ;-)

Let's recap: The reason folks don't believe your claim of "just wanting to END the code test" is because your behavior proves otherwise.

And as for "nastygrams" - well, all anyone has to do is check how many

Is there really a problem here? Or is it that we have fun arguing this issue here? Ham are. for the most part, quite well behaved, unlike the CBers. So I don't see what is broken in ham radio testing.

Like I said, the Amateur Radio Service is a one-way national service being offered BY the federal government TO qualified members of the ARS. It is the federal government that is serving amateur radio, not the other way around.

This is the first time I have ever seen the old format but I must admit I prefer the old format to the new, without the answers published in advance. Actually the new extra class format asks the same sort of questions but being able to answer the old format seems to more accurately measure one's basic understanding of an amplifier circuit. I vote for the old. Why did they change it to multiple guess?

well, contrary to your assertions, it appeared in the FR and the end date

Assuming for a moment that I did, indeed, hold two ship licenses (one of which was for an ocean-going trawler - lmao) is there a law which states I cannot hold multiple ship licenses?

So? Is there a law that places a limit on the # of callsigns one individual can be trustee of?

So? Is there a law (or Part 97 regulation) which states individuals cannot use PO Boxes for their mailing addresses?

Doesn't Morkie use a PO Box for his license?

lmao.. damn Lennie, you've done way too many drugs in your day.

I'm touched that you're so obsessed with my life. It really is quite hilarious.

I can pick up the Rhodyland phone book and find reference to 3 other Michael Deignan's in my state alone.

My name is neither uncommon nor unusual, it is, actually, a relatively common Irish last name, as are my first (and middle) names.

Now, I'll grant you, in the Deep South you're not likely to find many folks with my last name.. but in Boston? Quite a few.

What's it "tell" that Morkie uses a PO Box for his mailing address?

What's Morkie hiding?

I use a PO Box when I have to. No law or regulation states I cannot.

> Anyone with a full

But then again, Lennie, we've known for at least a decade you're not playing with a full deck.

> The mighty "RF Commandos"

Oddly enough, the RF Commandos is still in full operation -- we even have our own club callsign, used principally for the automated operation of our hidden transmitters. And gasp I'm STILL the trustee! Drop by sometime, perhaps we'll even let you be the 'fox' in our foxhunts -- though I imagine there wouldn't be much challenge DFing a drooling old fool in a wheelchair, would there be?

> I have no "visiting nurse" and do not use or wear "diapers."

There is no other logical explanation for your attitude other than a cold, wet diaper. Common with folks your age, Lennie. Probably explains why you can't get a ham license too.

I hadn't thought about it that way but of course it is true that VE's can be assumed to have no academic qualifications and must grade the tests using a template with holes. You are absolutely correct on this Len.

Amplifier? No such thing!

Just two types of oscillators:

1) Self-sustaining oscillator.

2) Input-controlled oscillator (smaller input--smaller oscillations, larger input--larger oscillations, "special case"=no input--no oscillations).

The questions I listed above were from the 1976 Novice study guide...

>I vote for the old. Why did > they change it to multiple guess?

It's a bit of a story:

>From the first days of amateur licensing to 1950, all US amateur license written exams were a mixture of essay questions, draw-a-diagram questions, show-your-work calculation questions, and multiple choice questions. Test preparation and grading were all done by FCC or other government officials (FCC did not exist until the early 1930s).

When the Novice license was created in 1951, its test was all multiple-choice. But the test preparation and grading were all still done by FCC. Through the 1950s the other license classes remained as they had been.

All this time, the license exams were considered almost government secrets. The actual tests were not public knowledge. Instead, FCC published "study guides" in essay format that indicated the areas the tests covered.

About 1961, FCC decided to "modernize" the license tests. They were all converted to multiple choice format, with a new answer sheet that could be machine-graded. This transition did not take place overnight, though - the field offices first used up their supply of old tests before going to the new ones.

Still, the tests themselves remained secret, and the study guides stayed in essay format even though the tests themselves were multiple choice.

By changing the written tests to multiple-choice, the person grading them did not need to know anything about the test content. This greatly reduced the FCC's workload in administering the tests. That was the main reason for the change - to reduce FCC's workload.

In the 1970s, there was a fellow on the West Coast named Dick Bash who published a series of books whose contents were reportedly almost identical to the actual tests. He reportedly did this by stationing himself or a helper outside FCC offices, questioning people who had just taken the tests, and paying them for each question they could remember. He also reportedly sent people to FCC to take the tests - not to pass them, but to remember what was on them.

This caused a lot of outcry and protest in both the amateur community and FCC. But the top brass at FCC refused to go after Bash, and his books stayed on the market. Although the rules said that the contents of the exam were not to be divulged to others, FCC did not stop Bash at all.

This system continued until about 1983, when FCC created the VE/QPC system. The VE/QPC system turned over most of the testing work to unpaid volunteers. The Question Pool Committee prepared and maintained the questions used on the tests, and the Volunteer Examiners administered them. VE fees went to pay the direct expenses of the system - duplicating, facility rental, postage, etc. FCC retained ultimate control, approving all the questions and setting guidelines, but leaving the grunt work to unpaid amateur volunteers.

The VE/QPC system meant that the tests could no longer even keep up the appearance of being secret. The question pools were made public, and there were no more study guides, since the actual exam was available. It also relieved FCC of an enormous amount of administrative work, which was the main reason for the change.

The idea was that the number of questions in the pools would be much larger than the number on the actual test, and that individual tests would be made by a random choice of questions from the pools.

That's how we got the system we have now.

Ah, if Webster's fails then try again using the Federal Regs huh... ;)

>That part cannot be argued.

Your usage can be argued though. Heck anything can be argued...

>The "service" that is performed is by the federal government for the

You said (quote):
"Seems to me that a ham who is a jack-of-all-trades-
and-master-of-none would be more valuable to the
"service" than one who is ignorant of most trades
and master of one."

If as you say the "service" is that performed by the Government for the citizens, then how does your sentence make any real sense? Use hobby and it makes perfect sense.

>It also meets the definition of "hobby". It is not a choice of either/or. It is both.

It is both only if service = hobby. And service does not equal hobby, that was my point. Everybody here knows what you meant including me. 'Service' has been used for 'hobby' as long as 'CW' has been used for 'code'. And most hams think that service means that we perform some kind of terribly useful service to the public. But the truth be told, we are more a pain in the butt to both the public and the government than any kind of real service. There. Now can we stop with the semantics... ;)

Lennie's had the proverbial "hard on" for me since he showed up on USENET back in the mid 90's. I can only conclude his obsession with me is due to the fact that I have a ham radio license while, alas, he does not.

> This isn't a new thing, or a secret. Look up his 1998

What is even more amusing is if you look up Lennie's comments to the FCC, out of thousands of pages of comments, he felt the need to rebut my comments virtually line for line.

> He specifically asked FCC to do the following in response to NPRM
> 98-143:

I have always felt stronger (not read: more difficult) theory examinations were more important to the ARS than morse code testing. It is an opinion that I hold to this day.

I actually have my NCI membership certificate packed someone in my boxes.

I still feel two license classes - a 50MHZ+ and a 30MHZ- would not necessarily be a bad idea.

> This was almost ten years ago. I don't think Mike has changed

Not at all. I still feel all my ideas presented 8 years ago hold merit today.

I do not really see any need for two HF licenses. The FCC should simply eliminate the General license and have a Class A and Class B license.

> Well, it's interesting to see that you can be nasty to those > who agree with you....

Since Lennie's first appearance... oh, 10? years ago, he's pretty much been a nasty fellow.

As I've posted in the past, he reminds me a great deal of my long-since-departed paternal grandmother, who was so miserable, she had to try and make everyone else around her miserable too. I can only conclude that Lennie's inability to get a ham license has made him very, very miserable.

I disagree.

Yes. I've stated before that certain types of questions -- i.e. definitions, regulations, etc. -- tend to be more rote memorization. However, there is no reason why those examination questions cannot likewise be randomized to some extent.

However, my proposal has been to randomize the correct answers (as much as possible). Granted, my choice of question was not ideal. Rather than using a range, use a specific frequency and 3 distractors, requiring the applicant to choose the correct frequency (hence, knowing band limits, etc.)

Yes. Some questions naturally lend themselves to randomization then others.

In some respects, I think definition questions, such as "what is ohm's law" simply be eliminated. Either the person knows what ohms law is (via a test question where they have to use it to solve a problem) or they do not. Having the definition as a test question is silly.

I'm not really sure of this.

I think writing a computer program to generate examinations, and releasing the examination to the public so folks could generate their own tests in prep for taking the "real thing", would, in fact, be a 'good thing'. Heck, I'm sure W5YI would love to charge prospective hams $25 for the "actual program used to generate your FCC Examination!"

Plus, it eliminates the need for the VECs to constantly maintain a pool of questions -- less long-term work. With randomization, they have a near inifinite pool of questions, all generated at the time a test is needed.

Fraud is, alas, a criminal offense. At no time did I violate any Part 97 rules or regulations. Nor for that matter have I ever been arrested, charged, or convicted of any crime, including fraud.

On the other hand, being a Gay Pagan Dyslexic Ham is an offense which the military court-martials people for -- at least, in the past.

Look it up for yourself, Morkie. The content of the FCC communications addressed to me are easy to obtain via Google. No where do they mention "good amateur practice", nor do they mention any violation of Part 97 (or any other federal regulation, for that matter).

Sorry if that gets your panties in a wad, but thems the facts.

The only "fraud" here, Morkie, is your impersonation of a radio amateur.

At no time was my license as a radio amateur ever in jeopardy of being revolked, as at no time did I ever violate any portion of Part 97, nor any other federal laws or regulations.

Too bad, so sad, for you Morkie.

Considering you cannot form a coherent sentence without at least one gramatical and spelling error, you are certainly in no position to criticize other peoples' spelling.

I never said Lennie couldn't "get" a ham license. Lennie's not very likely to get one, because Lennie likes to bitch, moan, and complain. Amateur Radio and code testing is merely a means to that end.

Mark, Jimmie's comments about me are neither "lie" nor "truth."
The poor guy gets a hard one every time his browser shows my name on the day's messages. He's just "not with it." :-)
When he sees my name (or anyone who has "wronged" him, he gets a correction orgasm going and his hand trembles, wanting to ruler-spank the knuckles of what she thinks are "children."

He gets a tad irrational at times, as witnessed by his trading his Nun of the Above character for Judge Judy. [still transgendering but if he likes it, fine...all kinds of folks like that here in LA...:-)]

Note that "Judge" has "ruled" on the admissability of evidence, namely "there is no statute of limitations in a newsgroup!"
Damn, just gotta LOVE his rationalizations of his/her conduct!

Tsk, a lot of what Jimmie be doing is just Cry-Baby time. All sorts of baby monitors all over the country are making RFI on 49 MHz these days. His "side" LOST. Now he wants retribution.
[he thinks he's a "Prisoner?" and looks like Patrick McGoohan?]

If I was really and truly lusting after an amateur license, then I would have gotten one in 1991. That wasn't on my list of wants-and-warrants in any clipboard on the dash. I still had my First 'phone (albeit converted automatically to a GROL with a lifetime, no renewal), an expired PLMRS radio station license, a couple of CB licenses (from back in the days when such were necessary). I don't need ANY title or honorific either in front or behind my legal name, am secure in what I can do and not do. I've not only been IN "big business" of HF communications but lived IN an antenna field far larger than the biggest amateur antenna farm ever built (a converted airfield, over 2 square miles worth). I've communicated by radio from the land, from the air (while at the controls of an aircraft), from the sea (okay, Ventura Harbor...:-) plus doing a bunch of other communicating over radio while working on DoD contracts.

Now, I have to admit that actually DOING amateur radio, all nice, legal, and proper like MIGHT be a fun thing in retirement but the "Judges" (besides Jimmie-Judy) insist I must fall into ranks, march right along to their commands, salute them and call them SIR and other bullshit. Sorry, been there, done that, got three-up and one-down of an E-5 to do that nice, legal, and proper. :-) If anyone wants to "question" that, they can "get in front of the tube" (in LAPD parlance). :-)

These Faithfull Followers of the Church of St. Hiram can have their morsemanship, marry it, have sex with it, live with it forever for all I care. Ain't on my desire list to RE-CREATE the radio world of the 1930s. I just don't believe that ANY newcomers have to test for morse code cognition...just because a bunch of mentally-old codgers with morse on their brains try to force them into that. NOBODY made them "officials" or Moses Part II, the keeper of the radio tablets...but they've gone into some burning bush and been consumed by the CONTROL fire! They are control-freaks mightily engaged in showing the unbelievers the "glory of their cause" as the self-appointed, self-anointed Guardians of the Olde Wayes.

Fuggem, that's NOT fun. That's pathetic selfishness on their part...hyprocritcal bullshit in trying to make all others do as they did once upon a time in the last century.

>now yes along the way Len has made comments on the other ARS matter so >wht

Jimmie NOserve NO like dat. He wants to Control others, "make" them respect His Works. He refuses to acknowledge that He is NOT a god and won't admit he has faults (some of his faults might rival San Andreas)...but he LOVES to nit-pick and find fault with those who disagree with him. WOW does he LOVE to that! He loves to pull things out of context, make them APPEAR as if they were the Most Immoral Things Done By Man!

Judge Judy und der Uber Oberst are obsessed with eliminating the rights of US citizens to speak to the US government on ANY matter that They decide is "proper." The poor dears ought to understand that US amateur radio does NOT "belong" to Them nor does talking about it be EXCLUSIVELY limited ONLY to already-licensed amateurs. Tsk, they never "owned" it and neither had one single solitary "official" standing in anything but their own doo-doo.

>why do you have a problem with that (not realy expecting an answer

Mark, you will NEVER get a coherent, valid answer on that.
He will turn that on its ear and wind up blaming you for having the temerity to even ask such a thing! Jimmie have deciduous delusions (if not dementia with his mental leaves already fallen) of grandeur since He "is always right" and any opposing him are "always wrong."

Let him stay regressed, he can't repress anyone anymore.
Leave him alone in his little dreams of glory in the airwaves, busy "pioneering" things long after others had been doing it long before him. He lives in the past, the works of others, trying to ally himself to their time-space continuum, perhaps hoping the glory and recognition will somehow, magically transfer to himself. It won't.

Oh, boo-hoo, code testing will soon be GONE! All the adamant pro-coders better hold a conference and brainstorm more rationales on why They are so "superior."
They MUST do that...their psyches are glued to fixations that they are inherently "superior" and cannot bear to lose it! Morse code UNTER alles! :-)

Don't you know what it means when someone puts a common word in parentheses?

Once again, from Webster's: "service - an administrative division, as of a government". There is no service required by the members of the Amateur Radio Service.
The "service" is a benefit that the federal government performs for those citizens who meet the qualifications, not vice versa.

Maybe we could have combination questions, ones that require several pieces of knowledge to get right.

The maximum SSB peak envelope power you are permitted to have on your linear amplifier on 14.060MHz is:

a) 1KW
b) 2KW
c) 0KW
d) 250w

answer is c, because that frequency is outside the phone subband.

Back in 1976 when I took the general written, they had a question like

You have a linear amp transmitting single sideband phone. The plate voltage is 1KV. What is the max peak plate current you can have on the output tubes?

At the time, the rules defined the max RF power you were allowed to transmit as the product of the voltage and amperage supplied to the output tubes. And single side band phone had a special rule on max power, called "peak envelope power" of 2KW. As measured by a typical analog ammeter with a bouncing needle. Which had a certain amount of error that was consistent with the usual ammeters hams had back then that had to be factored in (I've forgotten what it was, something like 0.7 or just 0.5?). So that's three things you had to know to answer this one question. So the answer would be 1 amp or maybe 1.4 amps of current from the 1KV power supply.

Quite true, Alun. The FCC Overseas Bureau has had documentation on WRC-07 for over a year...all the agenda items. No "mode sub-bands" for amateurs there.

>There are no ITU requirements for mode

Carl did not effect the almost-total revision of Radio Regulation S25 at WRC-03. The IARU wanted that for a couple years prior to 2003. While that included making the code test an option for all administration, there were many other changes also done to S25. It helped greatly that the chief representative of No-Code International was AT WRC-03, but the S25 changes would have been made regardless. The ARRL did not side with the IARU on removing the code test absolute requirement.

If there is a movement of US citizens to change the amateur radio sub-bands, then that will be handled in normal fashion at the FCC, not in Geneva. A Petition will be sent, the FCC may publish that and as for Comments...or issue an NPRM on proposed revisions also asking for Comments. After the Comment period is over, there's a long, long wait for decisions, whether to be or not to be an R&O.
After the R&O there will be a much longer period of cry-baby losers moaning, bitching, making threats and other fun stuff...some predicting the End Of The World...which it may be for some losers. :-)

>None of this has ever been about wanting to destroy CW as a mode. you can >dit and dah to your heart's content for all I care.

Quite true, Alun. However, I suspect the REAL problem is the PCTA attempting to keep their perceived power which they enjoyed prior to FCC 06-178...that and the readily-available (and standard) boasting of being a "20 WPM Tested" Extra. That made them "better" than anyone else and many got drunk on that "better-than-thou" elixir.

Some went too far...such as the stunt that Deignan, Michael P. did in obtaining a Hawaii
P.O. Box "address" in order to change from his old vanity KD1HZ to KH6HZ...plus inventing a dozen
"clubs" (that never existed) and getting amateur radio "club" calls for them. While Deignan didn't quite do an illegal act, his actions DID violate the SPIRIT of the law. The FCC made him give up those calls for nonexistant clubs and forced him to identify his regular amateur call mailing address to his real residence.

The Internet went public in 1991. In just 15 1/2 years it has already impacted the lives of most Americans, doing business or just doing communications with others. It's now one of the fabrics of our society.

Not allowed in the 1930s time-frame mentality of the Rulers of amateur radio, John. One MUST be a skilled radio operator of the 1930s period, even in 2007. Beep, beep.

You mean the ARRL, right? :-)

Geez, John, the ARRL started out as a small club busy trying to hack the commercial telegram services. Then they lost it when they found out it could MAKE MONEY
for them (through publishing).

>Now I say, "Let us remember the names and calls of these individuals

I disagree a bit there, John. I put them in the Selfish Control-Freak category who ODed on POWER. It's "1984"
in redux. "They know what is best for amateur radio" was their ultimate condescension. Say that over and over and over and over and over again, especially in printed media, and one begets believers. It did. The Al-Codah.
Fundamentalism hammered out in Brass.

>Yes, let these men now go down in history for what they were, what they >did and what they still remain ...

Open any ARRL publication and you will see them all...but done up in the League's own descriptions. There is no limit on their self-praise and honors heaped upon honors of their League brethren. Others, the REAL pioneers of radio, are simply omitted. Those never existed. Poof.

Ooopsie, a tad over the top there, John. :-)

While that is true one is not - EVER - supposed to criticize those "who know what is best for amateur radio!" You may face ex-communication!

Sigh. It's either 'Animal Farm' or 'Animal House.' Getting hard to tell them apart. Especially with all the "news" about Spark Gap transmitter experiments lately. Real cutting-edge technical radio stuff...

Irreverently,

sorry there I will say you are wrong he is lying: he is making a statement that is provable flase and that he knows or should know is false

a tad irational I must presume you are being kind no wait he is occasionaly merely a tad irational sometime he is out there with Charley Manson

You have quite an array of sex lames -- you _must_ be twelve. You're too young for usenet, kid. Come back next year. Wait, what am I saying???
Stick around until next month, /then/ take off.

L. Mencken

"Consider that language a moment. 'Purposefully and materially supported hostilities against the United States' is in the eye of the beholder, and this administration has proven itself to be astonishingly impatient with criticism of any kind. The broad powers given to Bush by this legislation allow him to capture, indefinitely detain, and refuse a hearing to any American citizen who speaks out against Iraq or any other part of the so-called 'War on Terror.'

"If you write a letter to the editor attacking Bush, you could be deemed as purposefully and materially supporting hostilities against the United States. If you organize or join a public demonstration against Iraq, or against the administration, the same designation could befall you. One dark-comedy aspect of the legislation is that senators or House members who publicly disagree with Bush, criticize him, or organize investigations into his dealings could be placed under the same designation. In effect, Congress just gave Bush the power to lock them up." -- William Rivers Pitt

"It has become clear in recent months that a critical mass of the American people have seen through the lies of the Bush administration; with the president's polls at an historic low, growing resistance to the war Iraq, and the Democrats likely to take back the Congress in mid-term elections, the Bush administration is on the ropes. And so it is particularly worrying that President Bush has seen fit, at this juncture to, in effect, declare himself dictator." -- Frank Morales

No, that's not it, Mike.

The problem Len has with you isn't your license, or lack of it. It's the fact that you dared to disagree with him, and/or correct one or more of his mistakes here. Once someone does either or both of those things, Len's reaction is 100% predictable. In fact, there's a handy profile that pretty much sums it all up:

"No matter what employment, education, life experience or government/military service a person has, if that person disagrees with any of Len's views, or corrects any of Len's mistakes, he/she will be the target of Len's insults,
ridicule, name-calling, factual errors, ethnic/gender/racial slurs, excessive
emoticons and general infantile behavior."

What you did was to disagree with Len. That's all it takes.

Pages and pages worth, too, even though your comments were 100% in support of the maximum possible Morse Code test reduction under the treaty, and complete Morse Code test elimination at the earliest possible moment if/when the treaty changed.

Think about it. If all Len really wanted was Morse Code test elimination, why would he send in all those pages refuting someone who wanted exactly that, and who supported that part of the NCI agenda to the letter? The explanation is simple: You were/are a target because you disagreed with Len.

Well, we agree on the desirability of better written tests. We disagree on the Morse Code test in that you support complete elimination of that test and I don't.

However, FCC's response has been to reduce both the number of written tests and the total number of questions required for every class of license.
The other ideas on written test improvement were ignored by FCC

Len does not want to discuss the merit of anyone's ideas if they disagree with his ideas, or if they correct his mistakes.

About 10 years, and an enormous volume of verbiage under a variety of screen names. He used the screen name "Averyfine@aol.com" for several posts here,
then later denied ever using that name in rrap.

Of course someone (ahem) pointed out that he had, indeed, posted to rrap
using that screen name. Len's reaction was quite predictable.

See the paragraph above about Len's behavior here. All anyone has to do is disagree with Len, or correct a mistake he makes, and it's showtime.

That's way too much for me to parse at 5am.

Let me see if I can put it in simplier terms

"If you don't kiss Len's ass, expect to be the target of his vitriol".

Yeah, that sounds about right.

> The explanation is simple: You were/are a target because you > disagreed with Len.

I laugh about it to this day. Thousands of pages of comments, hundreds (if not thousands of hams) responding, and Lennie

> Well, we agree on the desirability of better written tests. We > elimination of that test and I don't.

Something a few of the posters here (oddly enough, the most vocal/rabid members of the No-Code Agenda, it would seem) cannot simply seem to grasp is that gentlemen can agree to disagree without resorting to ad hominem attacks.

I am not entirely opposed to having a "skills test" in addition to a theory examination. There is precedent in other testing scenarios maintained by the government. For example, to get a pilot's license, you not only take a written test, you also have to take a 'hands on' test.

Of course, CW is a very easy method "skills test" to implement, which makes it a natural selection for the that component in ham radio testing.

I can understand why you would support such a test. This is, IMO, a legitimate course of reasoning on your part and I can understand the viewpoint.

While I agree with it in principle, personally, I do not feel that a morse test is a good selection for a skills test.

Furthermore, I cannot think of a really good alternative, either. Thus, until someone can present a very concise idea on how to implement a pertinent skills test in the ARS today, I'll fall back to the side of having none.

> The other ideas on written test improvement were ignored by FCC

Unfortunately, the trend with licensing in ham radio is very similiar to the trend we saw wih CB radio licensing back in the mid 70's. It concerns me that testing gets more and more lax.

Another disturbing trend is the desire to modify our licensing standards for "quantity". Everyone focuses on license numbers, and continuing to grow the number of licensed amateurs. I believe the majority of changes in our licensing system over the past 15 years has been directly related to people's desires to 'swell our ranks'.

I've always been a proponent of quality over quantity. I would rather have one person interested in learning radio electronics, antenna theory, etc. over two people who are nothing more than glorified applicance operators.

> You mean you haven't got it "right out of the box"?

I may no longer be a member. Years ago Carl threatened to throw me out of NCI over my criticism of NCI publically, under the guise of me "really not being a no-code test advocate". What Stevenson really wanted was an army of little mindless zealots who reguritated what they were spoon-fed by NCI -- something I was not.

Lennie's fun to wind-up. Every time I post, you know his blood pressure rises a couple of points. He can't resist the urge to throw out some acerbic comments.

Doomsday Clock to wind closer to Armageddon

Last Updated: Wednesday, January 17, 2007 | 10:47 AM ET

CBC News
The face of the Doomsday Clock will shift closer to midnight Wednesday, symbolizing the impending destruction of humanity in a "Second Nuclear Age."

Chicago's Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, the group which has maintained the timepiece since 1947, is winding the minute hand closer to the grim hour for the first time since 2002, when it was frozen at seven minutes to midnight.

The Doomsday Clock is expected to tick over to five minutes to midnight on Wednesday. (courtesy The Bulletin of Atomic Scientists)

Now modern dangers such as global warming and the nuclear ambitions of Iran and North Korea are expected to inch the clock two minutes forward ï¿½ to five minutes to midnight ï¿½ though scientists have not confirmed the exact change.

Created in 1947
"The major new step reflects growing concerns about a 'Second Nuclear Age' marked by grave threats," including nuclear programs in North Korea and Iran, as well as continuing "launch-ready status" of some 2,000 to 25,000 warheads held by the U.S. and Russia, the scientists said in a statement Tuesday.

The world has used the Doomsday Clock as a measurable way to reflect the perils facing humanity since it was created in 1947. In its first year, the minute hand perched at seven minutes to midnight, and it has edged closer with each worsening nuclear and climate threat, or backwards to indicate more secure times.

Notably, Doomsday was two minutes to midnight ï¿½ its closest ever to doom ï¿½ during the Cold War in 1953, when the U.S. and Soviet Union began testing H bombs.

Renowned physicist Stephen Hawking is expected to join the Chicago-based scientists Wednesday to announce the clock-face change and speak on the nuclear and climate risks facing the world.

Hands to move forward on 'Doomsday Clock'
Monday, January 15, 2007
The keepers of the so-called 'Doomsday Clock' plan to move its hands forward for the first time in four years, saying worsening nuclear and climate threats have brought the world closer to atomic Armageddon.

The Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists said now was the ``most perilous period'' since the bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

Since 1947 the clock, with midnight representing nuclear apocalypse, has appeared on the cover of the magazine, which was founded by University of Chicago scientists alarmed about the dangers of the nuclear age.

The minute hand was last moved in February 2002, when it was pushed forward by two minutes, to seven minutes to midnight.

Theoretical physicist Stephen Hawking will be among scientists to speak on Wednesday when the BAS announces how far the hands will be moved this time.

The magazine said the ``major step'' reflected growing concerns about a ``second nuclear age'' marked by grave threats including nuclear ambitions in Iran and North Korea and unsecured nuclear materials in Russia and elsewhere.

The continuing ``launch-ready'' status of 2,000 of the 25,000 nuclear weapons held by the US and Russia, was also a problem, as was escalating terrorism.

The BAS said new pressure from climate change for expanded civilian nuclear power could increase proliferation risks.

The closest the clock has come to midnight is just two minutes away. That was in 1953, when the US and the Soviet Union tested thermonuclear devices within nine months of each other.

In 1991, in a wave of optimism at the end of the Cold War, it was set the furthest away, at 17 minutes away to midnight

The Doomsday Clock: Nuclear threat to world 'rising'

For 60 years, it has depicted how close the world is to nuclear disaster. Today, scientists will move its hands forward to show we are facing the gravest threat in at least 20 years
Wednesday, January 17, 2007

By Rupert Cornwell in Washington

Five years of international headlines tell of growing turmoil in the Middle East, international terrorism in Western capitals and more countries seeking the ultimate national security insurance policy.

Now climate change and oil insecurity is driving countries to seek nuclear power, bringing with it new dangers of proliferation in volatile parts of the globe.

Today the Doomsday Clock, devised by the Chicago-based Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists in 1947 at the dawn of the nuclear age, will make official what most thinking citizens feel in their bones - that the world has edged closer to nuclear Armageddon than at any time since the most precarious moments of the Cold War in the early 1980s.

At 2.30pm, simultaneous events will take place in London and Washington at which the symbolic clock will be moved forward from its present seven minutes to midnight, where it has stood since 2002. The reasons for the time being advanced five years ago were crumbling arms control treaties and a terrorist threat brought into shattering relief by 9/11.

At the start of 2007, not only is the picture darker on both those scores. The nuclear threat has also acquired an added and unquantifiable dimension, thanks to global warming - prompting the Bulletin to warn of a "Second Nuclear Age". The existing dangers could not be more obvious: the problem is where to start. What about Iran's quest for nuclear weapons, and the thinly veiled warnings from the undeclared but assumed nuclear power Israel that it will strike first to remove what it sees as an existentialist threat comparable to the Holocaust?

Or the nuclear test last year by North Korea, a member of George Bush's "axis of evil", which could have neighbouring Japan and South Korea seeking protection with nuclear weapons of their own? Or the nuclear arsenal of unstable Pakistan, where Islamic extremists have staged several assassination attempts against President Pervez Musharraf?

Or - perhaps the greatest danger of all - that having visited conventional terror on an unprecedented scale upon New York City on 11 September 2001, al-Qa'ida or some similar organisation will either get hold of a ready-made nuclear device or build one of its own, and then use it?

And why not? Grave doubts surround Russia's ability to secure its nuclear materials, many of them dating from the Soviet era, and to prevent its nuclear scientists from selling their skills to the highest bidder. If a terrorist group did explode even a crude dirty bomb (and the US claims to have disrupted such plots) the taboo that has prevented states from using nuclear weapons in anger since 1945 might be broken.

And in this new nuclear age, the deterrence doctrine of "mutually assured destruction", or MAD, that kept the Cold War cold, would not apply. The US and Russia may have 2,000 launch-ready weapons between them - but these would be of no more use against an amorphous terrorist group than Israel's nuclear arsenal against the Palestinians. Even so, a threshold would have been crossed and a regional, even generalised nuclear war, would become conceivable.

In 1947, the Doomsday Clock was first set at seven minutes to midnight, exactly where it has stood since 2002. On the Bulletin's reckoning, the planet's closest brush thus far with Armageddon came in 1953, when the clock's hand moved to two minutes to midnight after the US and the Soviet Union tested hydrogen bombs within nine months of each other.

Thereafter the clock has tracked the chills and thaws of the Cold War, and the successive arrival of Britain, France, China, India and Pakistan as recognised nuclear powers. The hand reached its "safest" point - 17 minutes to Armageddon - in 1991 when the US and the soon-to-disappear Soviet Union signed the Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty (START), and that year's Gulf War, driving Saddam Hussein from Kuwait, seemed to herald an era when the great powers could work together under the auspices of the UN. The 2003 Iraq invasion destroyed any such illusions. Once there were five proven nuclear powers. Now there are nine.

Global warming, argues the Bulletin, indirectly increases this risk. Civil nuclear power, which produces no greenhouse gases, is back in fashion and hundreds of nuclear reactors will be built. Yet enriched uranium, to power them, and plutonium are also the vital raw materials for nuclear weapons.

In this Second Nuclear Age, there will be more of these deadly commodities around. Small wonder the hand on the Doomsday Clock will move towards midnight. The only question is, how close will it get?

5 Minutes to Midnight
http://www.thebulletin.org/minutes-to-midnight/
Overview

The Bulletin of the Atomic Scientistsï¿½ Doomsday Clock conveys how close humanity is to catastrophic destruction--the figurative midnight--and monitors the means humankind could use to obliterate itself. First and foremost, these include nuclear weapons, but they also encompass climate-changing technologies and new developments in the life sciences and nanotechnology that could inflict irrevocable harm.

Nuclear

For four decades, the United Statesï¿½ and the Soviet Unionï¿½s overt hostility coupled with their enormous nuclear arsenals defined the nuclear threat. The equation for nuclear holocaust was simple: Heightened tensions between the two jittery superpowers would lead to an all-out nuclear exchange. Today, the potential for an accidental or inadvertent nuclear exchange between the United States and Russia remains, with both countries anachronistically maintaining more than 1,000 warheads on high alert, ready to launch within tens of minutes. But a deliberate attack by Russia or the United States on the other is unthinkable.

Unfortunately, however, the possibility of a nuclear exchange between countries remains. In 1999 and again in 2001, India and Pakistan threatened each other with nuclear arms. And despite past successes in limiting the spread of nuclear weapons to countries around the world, nuclear proliferation seems to present a great danger today, with countries such as North Korea and Iran actively pursuing the capability to produce nuclear weapons. Nuclear terrorism also poses a new risk, as fissile materials remain unsecured in many parts of the world, making them more available to groups that seek destructive means.

Environmental

Fossil-fuel technologies such as coal-burning plants powered the industrial revolution, bringing unparalleled economic prosperity to many parts of the world. In the 1950s, however, scientists began measuring year-to-year changes in the carbon dioxide concentration in the atmosphere that they could relate to fossil fuel combustion, and they began to develop the implications for Earthï¿½s temperature and for climate change.

Fifty years later, leading scientists agree that carbon-burning technologies continue to make Earth warmer at an unprecedented rate. They warn that the consequences could drastically alter both the planet and human life. Already, ice packs in Greenland are rapidly disappearing, which, in turn, threatens the existence of hundreds of species such as polar bears and the traditions of whole societies such as the Inuit. The future looks even bleaker, as scientists continue to observe cascading effects on Earthï¿½s complex ecosystems.

Emerging Technologies

Advances in genetics and biology over the last five decades have inspired a host of new possibilities--both positive and troubling. With greater understanding of genetic material and of how physiological systems interact, biologists can fight disease better and improve overall human health. But this knowledge may also afford opportunities to program organisms to do our bidding for malign purposes by manipulating brain functions, compromising bioregulation, and even by altering our reproductive capabilities. Complicating matters further, more groups and more individuals possess these high-consequence technologies than in the past--and more and more people will acquire them in the future. The emergence of nanotechnology--manufacturing at the molecular or atomic level--presents similar concerns, especially if coupled with chemical and biological weapons, explosives, or missiles. Such combinations could result in highly destructive missiles the size of an insect and microscopic delivery systems for dangerous pathogens.

Board Statement

17 January 2007

We stand at the brink of a second nuclear age. Not since the first atomic bombs were dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki has the world faced such perilous choices. North Koreaï¿½s recent test of a nuclear weapon, Iranï¿½s nuclear ambitions, a renewed U.S. emphasis on the military utility of nuclear weapons, the failure to adequately secure nuclear materials, and the continued presence of some 26,000 nuclear weapons in the United States and Russia are symptomatic of a larger failure to solve the problems posed by the most destructive technology on Earth.

As in past deliberations, we have examined other human-made threats to civilization. We have concluded that the dangers posed by climate change are nearly as dire as those posed by nuclear weapons. The effects may be less dramatic in the short term than the destruction that could be wrought by nuclear explosions, but over the next three to four decades climate change could cause drastic harm to the habitats upon which human societies depend for survival.

This deteriorating state of global affairs leads the Board of Directors of the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists--in consultation with a Board of Sponsors that includes 18 Nobel laureates--to move the minute hand of the ï¿½Doomsday Clockï¿½ from seven to five minutes to midnight.

Nuclear weapons present the most grave challenge to humanity, enabling genocide with the press of a button. In 1945, scientists warned the world about the nearly unimaginable destructive power of the atomic bombs they had created. As Eugene Rabinowitch, one of the cofounders of the Bulletin, wrote, ï¿½The Bulletinï¿½s Clock is not a gauge to register the ups and downs of the international power struggle; it is intended to reflect basic changes in the level of continuous danger in which mankind lives in the nuclear age, and will continue living, until society adjusts its basic attitudes and institutions.ï¿½ As inheritors and trustees of the Clock, we seek to warn the world that this level of danger has escalated precipitously.

The second nuclear era, unlike the dawn of the first nuclear age in 1945, is characterized by a world of porous national borders, rapid communications that facilitate the spread of technical knowledge, and expanded commerce in potentially dangerous dual-use technologies and materials. The Pakistan-based network that provided nuclear technologies to Libya, North Korea, and Iran is an example of the new challenges confronting the international community.

The current period of globalization coincides with an erosion of the global agreements and norms that have constrained the spread of nuclear weapons since 1970 when the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) came into force. The NPT provided standards, set up protocols for inspections and regulation through the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), and held out a promise of disarmament by the nuclear powers in exchange for restraint by those countries that did not have nuclear weapons. Compliance has always been voluntary, and until the last five years, nearly all governments felt that their interests were served by adhering to the NPT provisions. The 2005 NPT Review Conference, however, ended in failure, without any consensus on the core issues of verification of safeguards on national nuclear programs,

the peaceful use of nuclear power, and disarmament.

Iran, which is a signatory state of the NPT, has violated its IAEA obligations and obstructed efforts to determine the extent of its activities. North Korea, which withdrew from the NPT in 2003, followed through on its declared intention to test a nuclear weapon three years later. Although this test prompted stern global condemnation, the international community essentially acquiesced. The dominant concern was that North Korea might sell its nuclear weapons abroad. In effect, the message from the international community was ï¿½donï¿½t proliferateï¿½ rather than ï¿½donï¿½t become a nuclear power.ï¿½ In this regard, the North Korean test was doubly dangerous and sets an unfortunate example for other would-be nuclear powers.

The five NPT-recognized nuclear weapon states have failed in their obligation to make serious strides toward disarmament--most notably, the United States and Russia, which still possess 26,000 of the 27,000 nuclear warheads in the world. By far the greatest potential for calamity lies in the readiness of forces in the United States and Russia to fight an all-out nuclear war. Whether by accident or by unauthorized launch, these two countries are able to initiate major strikes in a matter of minutes. Each warhead has the potential destructive force of 8 to 40 times that of the atomic bomb dropped on Hiroshima, Japan, on August 6, 1945. In that relatively small nuclear explosion, 100,000 people were killed and a city destroyed; 50 of todayï¿½s nuclear weapons could kill 200 million people.

While the possibility of launching these powerful weapons may seem remote, experts in Russia and the United States are concerned about command and control systems that depend on complex electronic communications and information. Past incidents suggest that technical failures, misperception, and miscommunication happen in even the best-maintained systems. Such errors could lead to an accidental launch already programmed in the event of attack. Experts have documented four nuclear false alarms--in 1979, 1980, 1983, and 1995--where either the United States or Soviet/Russian forces were placed on the highest alert and missile launch crews were given preliminary launch warnings.

Sixteen years after the end of the Cold War, following substantial reductions in nuclear weapons by the United States and Russia, the two major powers have now stalled in their progress toward deeper reductions in their arsenals. Equally worrisome, the United States, in its 2002 Nuclear Posture Review, declared that nuclear weapons ï¿½provide credible military options to deter a wide range of threats,ï¿½ including chemical and biological weapons, as well as ï¿½surprising military developments.ï¿½ In early 2004, this new concept, which espouses the quick use of even nuclear weapons to destroy ï¿½time urgent targets,ï¿½ was put into operation. That the United States--a nation with unmatched superiority in conventional weapons--would place renewed emphasis on the need for nuclear weapons suggests to other nations that such arsenals are necessary to their security.

In the face of the major powersï¿½ continued reliance on nuclear weapons, other nations are following suit. Since the end of the Cold War, three countries have announced the possession of nuclear weapons--India, Pakistan, and North Korea. Israel possesses weapons but chooses not to declare them. The director of the IAEA, Mohamed ElBaradei, believes up to 30 countries have the capacity, and increasingly the motivation, to develop nuclear weapons in a very short time span.

Such developments have prompted some to declare the NPT a ï¿½failure.ï¿½ Yet this assessment ignores the decades-long success of the treaty in stemming nuclear proliferation. In 1963, President John F. Kennedy warned of the possibility of the United States facing a world ï¿½in which 15 or 20 or 25 nationsï¿½ would have nuclear weapons. In the decades following the entry into force of the NPT, only six countries have embarked on nuclear weapons programs and many others have shut down their programs, including Argentina, Brazil, Libya, and South Africa.

Even at the height of the Cold War, President Kennedy worried about U.S. alliesï¿½ acquisition of nuclear weapons technology. In recent years, however, the United States appears focused on denying nuclear weapons only to its adversaries, while accommodating its friends. Yet, as history demonstrates, countries that are deemed allies can quickly become adversaries. And the success of the illicit, Pakistan-based nuclear procurement network, which extended into Europe, shows how even friendly governments can fail to guard against the theft and smuggling of sensitive nuclear technology.

Reducing global nuclear arsenals is a key to keeping such weapons out of the hands of terrorists. Through the Cooperative Threat Reduction program, the United States and Russia have succeeded in finding, consolidating, and securing about half of Russiaï¿½s nuclear bombs and fissile material in just over a decade. European countries have also pledged to aid this effort to ensure that existing nuclear materials are kept out of the hands of terrorist groups. But bureaucratic and legal disputes, as well as inadequate funding, have frequently slowed the process.

The problem of unsecured fissile material is not confined to Russia, however. More than 1,400 metric tons of highly enriched uranium and approximately 500 tons of plutonium are distributed worldwide at some 140 sites, in unguarded civilian power plants and university research reactors, as well as in military facilities. The first report of the International Panel on Fissile Materials in September 2006 focused on the ease with which unauthorized groups, including terrorist groups, could obtain sufficient highly enriched uranium to make nuclear or radiological bombs.

The prospect of civilian nuclear power development in countries around the world raises further concerns about the availability of nuclear materials. Growth in nuclear power is anticipated to be especially high in Asia, where Japan is planning to bring on line five new plants by 2010, and China intends to build 30 nuclear reactors by 2020. Over the next five years, some two-dozen nuclear power plants are scheduled to be refurbished or rebuilt worldwide, and countries as diverse as Nigeria, Poland, and Vietnam have expressed interest in nuclear energy. In November 2006, the IAEA announced that four Mideast nations--Algeria, Egypt, Morocco, and Saudi Arabia--had declared their intentions to embark on nuclear energy programs.

Several factors are driving the turn to nuclear power--aging nuclear reactors, rising energy demands, a desire to diversify energy portfolios and reduce reliance on fossil fuels, and the need to reduce carbon emissions that cause climate change. Yet expansion of nuclear power increases the risks of nuclear proliferation. Enrichment facilities that produce low-enriched uranium for reactor fuel can be easily modified to produce weapons-usable, highly enriched uranium. Moreover, spent plutonium fuel from reactors is weapons-usable after reprocessing. It does not require much nuclear material to construct a fissile weapon: 1 to 3 kilograms of plutonium or 5 to 10 kilograms of highly enriched uranium is all that is needed for a single bomb.

The international community faces a dilemma: How to mitigate climate change without increasing the dangers of nuclear materials proliferation.

Global warming poses a dire threat to human civilization that is second only to nuclear weapons. The most authoritative scientific group on these issues, the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC), has concluded, ï¿½Most of the warming observed over the last 50 years is attributable to human activities.ï¿½ Carbon dioxide, principally from fossil fuel burning, has been accumulating in the atmosphere, where it acts like a blanket keeping Earth warm and heating up its surface, ocean, and atmosphere. As a result, current levels of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere are higher than at any time during the last 650,000 years.

Observations of changes in the atmosphere, on land, in the oceans, in glaciers, and in polar ice cores have led to worldwide scientific consensus about the causes of climate change. The most distinguished scientific bodies in the United States, including the National Academy of Sciences, the American Meteorological Society, and the American Association for the Advancement of Science have come to conclusions similar to those of the IPCC.

Disruptions in climate already appear to be happening faster in some regions than earlier predicted. In some areas warming has interrupted normal patterns, allowing insects to spread into new habitats, carrying diseases and destroying flora and fauna in zones that have no evolutionary protection. Through flooding or desertification, climate change threatens the habitats and agricultural resources that societies depend upon for survival. Coral reefs will disappear, forest fires will be more intense and more frequent, and heat waves and storms more damaging. In coming years, coastal cities will bear the brunt of sea-level rise, as we have already witnessed in New Orleans, compelling major shifts in human settlement patterns. As such, climate change is also likely to contribute to mass migrations and even to wars over arable land, water, and other natural resources.

Indeed, a ï¿½business as usualï¿½ scenario--wherein we take no further measures to reduce greenhouse gas emissions--would raise the global temperature 2.8 degrees Celsius (5 degrees Fahrenheit) by the end of the century, causing a sea-level rise of about 80 feet. The United States would lose most of its cities on the East Coast: Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Washington, and Miami, and nearly the whole state of Florida. China would have 250 million displaced people; India, 150 million.

Because climate change is a global problem, it will require global action. As China and India develop their economies, for example, they will need to find ways to reduce or neutralize their contributions of carbon dioxide to the atmosphere. Currently, however, the United States is the single largest producer of carbon dioxide emissions in the world. Efforts in this one country would have disproportionately large effects on world climate. As a wealthy and technologically advanced country, the United States is well positioned to reduce its carbon emissions.

Such reductions do not necessarily depend upon nuclear power as a panacea. Carbon emissions can be cut by implementing auto emissions limits, reducing subsidies for oil and coal production, supporting carbon-trading regimes, increasing taxes on gasoline, increasing energy efficiency by establishing manufacturing standards for appliances and lightbulbs, subsidizing solar and wind power development, and planting more trees, among others. Government funding and private investments are required to develop innovative technologies, such as fuel cells, biomass, and carbon sequestration. If we do not take measures in the next several years to reduce carbon emissions, the costs of disruption from climate change could be as high as 5 percent of global gross domestic product (GDP) each year, according to the October 2006 report authored by British economist Nicholas Stern. By contrast, the costs of mitigating climate change could be limited to about 1 percent of global GDP each year.

Turning back the Clock will depend on humanityï¿½s ability to think in new ways about how to cooperate to achieve common goals. We ask scientists, in the words of Eugene Rabinowitch, not to "retire in resignation and despair to their laboratories" but to publicly engage these issues and make their voices heard. And we implore governments to actively engage the scientific community for sound, nonpartisan technical advice. We urge immediate attention to climate change and caution those who believe nuclear energy is a problem-free solution. Finally, and most importantly, we call upon policy and opinion leaders, business and civic leaders, and the public to place the dangers of nuclear weapons at the top of their agendas for action.

More specifically, major progress toward a safer world would include:
Reducing the launch readiness of U.S. and Russian nuclear forces, and completely removing nuclear weapons from the day-to-day operations of their militaries;
Reducing the number of nuclear weapons by dismantling, storing, and destroying more than 20,000 warheads over the next 10 years;
Greatly increasing efforts to locate, store, and secure nuclear materials in Russia, the United States, and elsewhere. The Cooperative Threat Reduction program has provided an example of how even former adversaries can cooperate to reduce the dangers of nuclear weapons. Extending the principles of that program, including working side by side with other countries, establishing transparency, and initiating partnerships between government and the private sector to downblend highly enriched uranium, would be constructive;
Disavowing the development of new nuclear weapons and ratifying the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty (CTBT). To date, the CTBT has been ratified by 137 nations, but notable holdouts include the United States, China, India, Pakistan, North Korea, and Israel;
Stopping production of nuclear weapons material, including highly enriched uranium and plutonium--whether in military or civilian facilities. The proposed Fissile Material Cutoff Treaty should be taken up by the nuclear powers as a major step toward achieving this goal;
Engaging in serious and candid discussion about the potential expansion of nuclear power worldwide. As a means of addressing the threats from climate change, nuclear power should be considered as an alternative energy source. While nuclear energy production does not produce carbon dioxide, it does raise other significant concerns, such as the health and environmental hazards of nuclear waste, the production of nuclear materials that can be diverted to the production of weapons, and the safety and security of the plants themselves. As such, any contemplation of the expansion of nuclear power must be predicated upon a thorough assessment of the technological and legislative safeguards required to curb these risks;
Providing nuclear fuel for energy production in ways that drastically reduce the risk of spreading nuclear weapons. A number of arrangements have been proposed, beginning with the Acheson-Lilienthal Plan of 1946. More recent plans have called for international consortia that would oversee the production, distribution, storage, and disposal of nuclear materials;
Implementing stricter controls over trade in and shipment of nuclear technologies and materials. Harmonizing domestic laws across countries and enforcing these uniformly, as required under U.N. Security Council Resolution 1540, would be a step in the right direction;
Building on the strengths and successes of the IAEA by giving more authority to the agency to monitor and inspect nuclear facilities worldwide and by providing more financial and staff resources. The agency already has shown that it can effectively dismantle nuclear weapons programs and monitor internal developments over a period of years, as it did in Iraq from 1991 to 2001. It has proven its capacity and should be rewarded and its programs expanded;
Providing meaningful international fora to spur innovative solutions that halt nuclear proliferation and provide blueprints for radical reductions in nuclear weapons worldwide. The NPT Review Conferences could provide such an ongoing forum, if nuclear weapon countries would recognize the benefits of this institution for impeding the spread of lethal technologies.

The terrible and still unprecedented destructive power of nuclear weapons led Albert Einstein to observe, ï¿½With nuclear weapons, everything has changed, save our way of thinking.ï¿½ As we stand at the brink of a second nuclear age and at the onset of an era of unprecedented climate change, our way of thinking about the uses and control of technologies must change to prevent unspeakable destruction and future human suffering.

The Clock is ticking.

IT IS 5 MINUTES TO MIDNIGHT
2007
The world stands at the brink of a second nuclear age. The United States and Russia remain ready to stage a nuclear attack within minutes, North Korea conducts a nuclear test, and many in the international community worry that Iran plans to acquire the Bomb. Climate change also presents a dire challenge to humanity. Damage to ecosystems is already taking place; flooding, destructive storms, increased drought, and polar ice melt are causing loss of life and property.

Concerns regarding a nuclear terrorist attack underscore the enormous amount of unsecured--and sometimes unaccounted for--weapon-grade nuclear materials located throughout the world. Meanwhile, the United States expresses a desire to design new nuclear weapons, with an emphasis on those able to destroy hardened and deeply buried targets. It also rejects a series of arms control treaties and announces it will withdraw from the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty.

India and Pakistan stage nuclear weapons tests only three weeks apart. ï¿½The tests are a symptom of the failure of the international community to fully commit itself to control the spread of nuclear weaponsï¿½and to work toward substantial reductions in the numbers of these weapons,ï¿½ a dismayed Bulletin reports. Russia and the United States continue to serve as poor examples to the rest of the world. Together, they still maintain 7,000 warheads ready to fire at each other within 15 minutes.

1995
Hopes for a large post-Cold War peace dividend and a renouncing of nuclear weapons fade. Particularly in the United States, hard-liners seem reluctant to soften their rhetoric or actions, as they claim that a resurgent Russia could provide as much of a threat as the Soviet Union. Such talk slows the rollback in global nuclear forces; more than 40,000 nuclear weapons remain worldwide. There is also concern that terrorists could exploit poorly secured nuclear facilities in the former Soviet Union.

With the Cold War officially over, the United States and Russia begin making deep cuts to their nuclear arsenals. The Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty greatly reduces the number of strategic nuclear weapons deployed by the two former adversaries. Better still, a series of unilateral initiatives remove most of the intercontinental ballistic missiles and bombers in both countries from hair-trigger alert. ï¿½The illusion that tens of thousands of nuclear weapons are a guarantor of national security has been stripped away,ï¿½ the Bulletin declares.

1990
As one Eastern European country after another (Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Romania) frees itself from Soviet control, Soviet General Secretary Mikhail Gorbachev refuses to intervene, halting the ideological battle for Europe and significantly diminishing the risk of all-out nuclear war. In late 1989, the Berlin Wall falls, symbolically ending the Cold War. ï¿½Forty-four years after Winston Churchillï¿½s ï¿½Iron Curtainï¿½ speech, the myth of monolithic communism has been shattered for all to see,ï¿½ the Bulletin proclaims.

1988
The United States and Soviet Union sign the historic Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces Treaty, the first agreement to actually ban a whole category of nuclear weapons. The leadership shown by President Ronald Reagan and Soviet Premier Mikhail Gorbachev makes the treaty a reality, but public opposition to U.S. nuclear weapons in Western Europe inspires it. For years, such intermediate-range missiles had kept Western Europe in the crosshairs of the two superpowers.

U.S.-Soviet relations reach their iciest point in decades. Dialogue between the two superpowers virtually stops. ï¿½Every channel of communications has been constricted or shut down; every form of contact has been attenuated or cut off. And arms control negotiations have been reduced to a species of propaganda,ï¿½ a concerned Bulletin informs readers. The United States seems to flout the few arms control agreements in place by seeking an expansive, space-based anti-ballistic missile capability, raising worries that a new arms race will begin.

1981
The Soviet invasion of Afghanistan hardens the U.S. nuclear posture. Before he leaves office, President Jimmy Carter pulls the United States from the Olympics Games in Moscow and considers ways in which the United States could win a nuclear war. The rhetoric only intensifies with the election of Ronald Reagan as president. Reagan scraps any talk of arms control and proposes that the best way to end the Cold War is for the United States to win it.

1980
Thirty-five years after the start of the nuclear age and after some promising disarmament gains, the United States and the Soviet Union still view nuclear weapons as an integral component of their national security. This stalled progress discourages the Bulletin: ï¿½[The Soviet Union and United States have] been behaving like what may best be described as ï¿½nucleoholicsï¿½--drunks who continue to insist that the drink being consumed is positively ï¿½the last one,ï¿½ but who can always find a good excuse for ï¿½just one more round.ï¿½ï¿½

1974
South Asia gets the Bomb, as India tests its first nuclear device. And any gains in previous arms control agreements seem like a mirage. The United States and Soviet Union appear to be modernizing their nuclear forces, not reducing them. Thanks to the deployment of multiple independently targetable reentry vehicles (MIRV), both countries can now load their intercontinental ballistic missiles with more nuclear warheads than before.

1972
The United States and Soviet Union attempt to curb the race for nuclear superiority by signing the Strategic Arms Limitation Treaty (SALT) and the Anti-Ballistic Missile (ABM) Treaty. The two treaties force a nuclear parity of sorts. SALT limits the number of ballistic missile launchers either country can possess, and the ABM Treaty stops an arms race in defensive weaponry from developing.

1969
Nearly all of the worldï¿½s nations come together to sign the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. The deal is simpleï¿½the nuclear weapon states vow to help the treatyï¿½s non-nuclear weapon signatories develop nuclear power if they promise to forego producing nuclear weapons. The nuclear weapon states also pledge to abolish their own arsenals when political conditions allow for it. Although Israel, India, and Pakistan refuse to sign the treaty, the Bulletin is cautiously optimistic: ï¿½The great powers have made the first step. They must proceed without delay to the next oneï¿½the dismantling, gradually, of their own oversized military establishments.ï¿½

1968
Regional wars rage. U.S. involvement in Vietnam intensifies, India and Pakistan battle in 1965, and Israel and its Arab neighbors renew hostilities in 1967. Worse yet, France and China develop nuclear weapons to assert themselves as global players. ï¿½There is little reason to feel sanguine about the future of our society on the world scale,ï¿½ the Bulletin laments. ï¿½There is a mass revulsion against war, yes; but no sign of conscious intellectual leadership in a rebellion against the deadly heritage of international anarchy.ï¿½

After a decade of almost non-stop nuclear tests, the United States and Soviet Union sign the Partial Test Ban Treaty, which ends all atmospheric nuclear testing. While it does not outlaw underground testing, the treaty represents progress in at least slowing the arms race. It also signals awareness among the Soviets and United States that they need to work together to prevent nuclear annihilation.

1960
Political actions belie the tough talk of ï¿½massive retaliation.ï¿½ For the first time, the United States and Soviet Union appear eager to avoid direct confrontation in regional conflicts such as the 1956 Egyptian-Israeli dispute. Joint projects that build trust and constructive dialogue between third parties also quell diplomatic hostilities. Scientists initiate many of these measures, helping establish the International Geophysical Year, a series of coordinated, worldwide scientific observations, and the Pugwash Conferences, which allow Soviet and American scientists to interact.

After much debate, the United States decides to pursue the hydrogen bomb, a weapon far more powerful than any atomic bomb. In October 1952, the United States tests its first thermonuclear device, obliterating a Pacific Ocean islet in the process; nine months later, the Soviets test an H-bomb of their own. ï¿½The hands of the Clock of Doom have moved again,ï¿½ the Bulletin announces. "Only a few more swings of the pendulum, and, from Moscow to Chicago, atomic explosions will strike midnight for Western civilization."

The Soviet Union denies it, but in the fall, President Harry Truman tells the American public that the Soviets tested their first nuclear device, officially starting the arms race. ï¿½We do not advise Americans that doomsday is near and that they can expect atomic bombs to start

falling on their heads a month or year from now,ï¿½ the Bulletin explains. ï¿½But we think they have reason to be deeply alarmed and to be prepared for grave decisions.ï¿½

1947
As the Bulletin evolves from a newsletter into a magazine, the Clock appears on the cover for the first time. It symbolizes the urgency of the nuclear dangers that the magazineï¿½s founders--and the broader scientific community--are trying to convey to the public and political leaders around the world.

ANNOUNCEMENTS
Doomsday Clock Hand to Move

16 January 2007 | 12:55 PM

The Bulletin of Atomic Scientists (BAS) will move the minute hand of the "Doomsday Clock" on January 17, 2007, the first such change to the Clock since February 2002. The major new step reflects growing concerns about a "Second Nuclear Age" marked by grave threats, including: nuclear ambitions in Iran and North Korea, unsecured nuclear materials in Russia and elsewhere, the continuing "launch-ready" status of 2,000 of the 25,000 nuclear weapons held by the U.S. and Russia, escalating terrorism, and new pressure from climate change for expanded civilian nuclear power that could increase proliferation risks.

The BAS news event will take place simultaneously on January 17 at 9:30 ET at the American Association for the Advancement of Science in Washington, D.C., and at 2:30 GMT in London at the Royal Society in London.

News event speakers will include:
Stephen Hawking, professor of mathematics at the University of Cambridge, and a fellow of The Royal Society
Kennette Benedict, executive director, Bulletin of Atomic Scientists
Sir Martin Rees, president of The Royal Society, and professor of cosmology and astrophysics and master of Trinity College at the University of Cambridge
Lawrence M. Krauss, professor of physics and astronomy at Case Western Reserve University
Ambassador Thomas Pickering, a BAS director and co-chair of the International Crisis Group
A live, two-way satellite feed (with full Q&A) will connect the Washington, D.C., and London news events

To Participate In Person: You can join us for the simultaneous, two-site news event taking place on January 17, 2007 at 9:30 a.m. ET, American Association for the Advancement of Science, Auditorium, 1200 New York Avenue NW, Washington, D.C.; and 2:30 p.m. GMT, The Royal Society, Wellcome Trust Lecture Hall, 6-9 Carlton House Terrace, London. Please RSVP in advance by contacting Patrick Mitchell, (703) 276-3266, or pmitchell@hastingsgroup.com.

Can't Participate In Person?: In the U.S., reporters can join this live, phone-based global news conference at 9:30 a.m. ET on January 17, 2007 by dialing 1 (800) 860-2442 (Media in and around London should dial 0800-028-0531. All other reporters outside of the U.S. and the London area should dial 001-412-858-4600, which is not a toll-free line.) Ask for the "Bulletin of Atomic Scientists Doomsday Clock" news event. A streaming audio replay of the news event will be available on the Web at http://www.thebulletin.org as of 6 p.m. ET/11:00 GMT on January 17, 2007.

Contact: Patrick Mitchell, (703) 276-3266 or pmitchell@hastingsgroup.com.

Clock Moves Forward Two Minutes

15 January 2007 | 10:27 PM

The Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists (BAS) is moving the minute hand of the Doomsday Clock on January 17, 2007, from 7 to 5 minutes to midnight.

BAS announced the Clock change at an unprecedented joint news conference at the American Association for the Advancement of Science in Washington, DC, and the Royal Society in London. In a statement supporting the decision to move the hand of the Doomsday Clock, the BAS Board focused on two major sources of catastrophe: the perils of 27,000 nuclear weapons, 2000 of them ready to launch within minutes; and the destruction of human habitats from climate change.

Fourteen leading scientists and security experts writing in the January-February issue of the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, explore further the potential for catastrophic damage from human-made technologies.

Created in 1947 by the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, the Doomsday Clock has been adjusted only 17 times prior to today, most recently in February 2002 after the events of 9/11. At that time, BAS underscored the slow progress on global nuclear disarmament.

By moving the hand of the Clock closer to midnightï¿½the figurative end of civilizationï¿½the BAS Board is drawing attention to the increasing dangers from the spread of nuclear weapons in a world of violent conflict, and to the catastrophic harm from climate change that is unfolding.

At the announcement from London, Stephen Hawking, BAS Sponsor, professor of mathematics at the University of Cambridge, and a fellow of the Royal Society, said: "As scientists, we understand the dangers of nuclear weapons and their devastating effects, and we are learning how human activities and technologies are affecting climate systems in ways that may forever change life on Earth. As citizens of the world, we have a duty to alert the public to the unnecessary risks that we live with every day, and to the perils we foresee if governments and societies do not take action now to render nuclear weapons obsolete and to prevent further climate change."

>From Washington, Kennette Benedict, executive director of the Bulletin, said: "As we stand at the brink of a Second Nuclear Age and at the onset of unprecedented climate change, our way of thinking about the uses and control of technologies must change to prevent unspeakable destruction and future human suffering."

Sir Martin Rees, president of The Royal Society, professor of cosmology and astrophysics, master of Trinity College at the University of Cambridge, and BAS Sponsor said: "Nuclear weapons still pose the most catastrophic and immediate threat to humanity, but climate change and emerging technologies in the life sciences also have the potential to end civilization as we know it."

Lawrence M. Krauss, another BAS Sponsor and professor of physics and astronomy at Case Western Reserve University, said: "In these dangerous times, scientists have a responsibility to speak truth to power especially if it might provoke actions to reduce threats from the preventable technological dangers currently facing humanity. To do anything else would be negligent."

Ambassador Thomas Pickering, a BAS director and co-chair of the International Crisis Group, said: "Although our current situation is dire, we have the means today to successfully address these global problems. For example, through vigorous diplomacy and international agencies like the International Atomic Energy Agency, we can negotiate and implement agreements that could protect us all from the most destructive technology on Earthï¿½nuclear weapons."

The BAS statement outlines a number of steps that, if taken immediately, could help to prevent disaster, including the following:

Reduce the launch readiness of U.S. and Russian nuclear forces and completely removing nuclear weapons from the day-to-day operations of their militaries
Reduce the number of nuclear weapons by dismantling, storing, and destroying more than 20,000 warheads over the next 10 years, as well as greatly increasing efforts to locate, store, and secure nuclear materials in Russia and elsewhere
Stop production of nuclear weapons material, including highly enriched uranium and plutonium--whether in military or civilian facilities
Engage in serious and candid discussion about the potential expansion of nuclear power worldwide

Now that's funny. The problem with Len is he has pulled some covers here and pi$$ed off a few. As to Len being perfect? Well, maybe, maybe not--I kinda like him. As for Len being "predictable", hey look in a mirror, you are one we are making fun of for that very thing!!!

> For four decades, the United States&#65533; and the Soviet Union&#65533;s overt > hostility coupled with their enormous nuclear arsenals defined the > nuclear threat. The equation for nuclear holocaust was simple:
> Heightened tensions between the two jittery superpowers would lead to > an all-out nuclear exchange. Today, the potential for an accidental or > inadvertent nuclear exchange between the United States and Russia > remains, with both countries anachronistically maintaining more than > 1,000 warheads on high alert, ready to launch within tens of minutes.
> But a deliberate attack by Russia or the United States on the other is > unthinkable.
> Unfortunately, however, the possibility of a nuclear exchange between > countries remains. In 1999 and again in 2001, India and Pakistan > threatened each other with nuclear arms. And despite past successes in > limiting the spread of nuclear weapons to countries around the world, > nuclear proliferation seems to present a great danger today, with > countries such as North Korea and Iran actively pursuing the capability > to produce nuclear weapons. Nuclear terrorism also poses a new risk, as > fissile materials remain unsecured in many parts of the world, making > them more available to groups that seek destructive means.

> Environmental
>
> Fossil-fuel technologies such as coal-burning plants powered the > industrial revolution, bringing unparalleled economic prosperity to > many parts of the world. In the 1950s, however, scientists began > measuring year-to-year changes in the carbon dioxide concentration in > the atmosphere that they could relate to fossil fuel combustion, and > they began to develop the implications for Earth's temperature and for > climate change.
> Fifty years later, leading scientists agree that carbon-burning
> technologies continue to make Earth warmer at an unprecedented rate.
> They warn that the consequences could drastically alter both the planet > and human life. Already, ice packs in Greenland are rapidly > disappearing, which, in turn, threatens the existence of hundreds of > species such as polar bears and the traditions of whole societies such > as the Inuit. The future looks even bleaker, as scientists continue to > observe cascading effects on Earth's complex ecosystems.
>
> Emerging Technologies
> Advances in genetics and biology over the last five decades have > inspired a host of new possibilities--both positive and troubling. With > greater understanding of genetic material and of how physiological > systems interact, biologists can fight disease better and improve > overall human health. But this knowledge may also afford opportunities > to program organisms to do our bidding for malign purposes by > manipulating brain functions, compromising bioregulation, and even by > altering our reproductive capabilities. Complicating matters further, > more groups and more individuals possess these high-consequence > technologies than in the past--and more and more people will acquire > them in the future. The emergence of nanotechnology--manufacturing at > the molecular or atomic level--presents similar concerns, especially if

> Board Statement
> 17 January 2007
> We stand at the brink of a second nuclear age. Not since the first > atomic bombs were dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki has the world faced > such perilous choices. North Korea's recent test of a nuclear weapon, > Iran's nuclear ambitions, a renewed U.S. emphasis on the military > utility of nuclear weapons, the failure to adequately secure nuclear > materials, and the continued presence of some 26,000 nuclear weapons in > the United States and Russia are symptomatic of a larger failure to > solve the problems posed by the most destructive technology on Earth.

> As in past deliberations, we have examined other human-made threats to > civilization. We have concluded that the dangers posed by climate > change are nearly as dire as those posed by nuclear weapons. The > effects may be less dramatic in the short term than the destruction > that could be wrought by nuclear explosions, but over the next three to > four decades climate change could cause drastic harm to the habitats > upon which human societies depend for survival.
>
> This deteriorating state of global affairs leads the Board of Directors > of the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists--in consultation with a Board > of Sponsors that includes 18 Nobel laureates--to move the minute hand > of the "Doomsday Clock" from seven to five minutes to midnight.
>
>
> Nuclear weapons present the most grave challenge to humanity, enabling > genocide with the press of a button. In 1945, scientists warned the > world about the nearly unimaginable destructive power of the atomic > bombs they had created. As Eugene Rabinowitch, one of the cofounders of > the Bulletin, wrote, "The Bulletin's Clock is not a gauge to register
> the ups and downs of the international power struggle; it is intended > to reflect basic changes in the level of continuous danger in which > mankind lives in the nuclear age, and will continue living, until > society adjusts its basic attitudes and institutions." As inheritors > and trustees of the Clock, we seek to warn the world that this level of > danger has escalated precipitously.
>
> The second nuclear era, unlike the dawn of the first nuclear age in > 1945, is characterized by a world of porous national borders, rapid > communications that facilitate the spread of technical knowledge, and > expanded commerce in potentially dangerous dual-use technologies and > materials. The Pakistan-based network that provided nuclear > technologies to Libya, North Korea, and Iran is an example of the new > challenges confronting the international community.
> The current period of globalization coincides with an erosion of the > global agreements and norms that have constrained the spread of nuclear > weapons since 1970 when the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) came > into force. The NPT provided standards, set up protocols for > inspections and regulation through the International Atomic Energy > Agency (IAEA), and held out a promise of disarmament by the nuclear > powers in exchange for restraint by those countries that did not have > nuclear weapons. Compliance has always been voluntary, and until the > last five years, nearly all governments felt that their interests were > served by adhering to the NPT provisions. The 2005 NPT Review > Conference, however, ended in failure, without any consensus on the > core issues of verification of safeguards on national nuclear programs,

> the peaceful use of nuclear power, and disarmament.
>
> Iran, which is a signatory state of the NPT, has violated its IAEA
> obligations and obstructed efforts to determine the extent of its > activities. North Korea, which withdrew from the NPT in 2003, followed > through on its declared intention to test a nuclear weapon three years > later. Although this test prompted stern global condemnation, the > international community essentially acquiesced. The dominant concern > was that North Korea might sell its nuclear weapons abroad. In effect, > the message from the international community was "don't proliferate" > rather than "don't become a nuclear power." In this regard, the > North Korean test was doubly dangerous and sets an unfortunate example > for other would-be nuclear powers.
> The five NPT-recognized nuclear weapon states have failed in their > obligation to make serious strides toward disarmament--most notably,
> the United States and Russia, which still possess 26,000 of the 27,000 > nuclear warheads in the world. By far the greatest potential for > calamity lies in the readiness of forces in the United States and > Russia to fight an all-out nuclear war. Whether by accident or by > unauthorized launch, these two countries are able to initiate major > strikes in a matter of minutes. Each warhead has the potential > destructive force of 8 to 40 times that of the atomic bomb dropped on > Hiroshima, Japan, on August 6, 1945. In that relatively small nuclear > explosion, 100,000 people were killed and a city destroyed; 50 of > today's nuclear weapons could kill 200 million people.
> While the possibility of launching these powerful weapons may seem > remote, experts in Russia and the United States are concerned about > command and control systems that depend on complex electronic > communications and information. Past incidents suggest that technical > failures, misperception, and miscommunication happen in even the > best-maintained systems. Such errors could lead to an accidental launch > already programmed in the event of attack. Experts have documented four > nuclear false alarms--in 1979, 1980, 1983, and 1995--where either the > United States or Soviet/Russian forces were placed on the highest alert > and missile launch crews were given preliminary launch warnings.
> Sixteen years after the end of the Cold War, following substantial > reductions in nuclear weapons by the United States and Russia, the two > major powers have now stalled in their progress toward deeper > reductions in their arsenals. Equally worrisome, the United States, in > its 2002 Nuclear Posture Review, declared that nuclear weapons
> "provide credible military options to deter a wide range of threats," > including chemical and biological weapons, as well as "surprising > military developments." In early 2004, this new concept, which > espouses the quick use of even nuclear weapons to destroy "time urgent > targets," was put into operation. That the United States--a nation > with unmatched superiority in conventional weapons--would place renewed

> emphasis on the need for nuclear weapons suggests to other nations that > such arsenals are necessary to their security.
>
> In the face of the major powers' continued reliance on nuclear > weapons, other nations are following suit. Since the end of the Cold > War, three countries have announced the possession of nuclear > weapons--India, Pakistan, and North Korea. Israel possesses weapons but > chooses not to declare them. The director of the IAEA, Mohamed > ElBaradei, believes up to 30 countries have the capacity, and > increasingly the motivation, to develop nuclear weapons in a very short > time span.
>
> Such developments have prompted some to declare the NPT a 'failure.'
> Yet this assessment ignores the decades-long success of the treaty in > stemming nuclear proliferation. In 1963, President John F. Kennedy > warned of the possibility of the United States facing a world 'in > which 15 or 20 or 25 nations' would have nuclear weapons. In the > decades following the entry into force of the NPT, only six countries > have embarked on nuclear weapons programs and many others have shut > down their programs, including Argentina, Brazil, Libya, and South > Africa.
>
> Even at the height of the Cold War, President Kennedy worried about > U.S. allies' acquisition of nuclear weapons technology. In recent > years, however, the United States appears focused on denying nuclear > weapons only to its adversaries, while accommodating its friends. Yet, > as history demonstrates, countries that are deemed allies can quickly > become adversaries. And the success of the illicit, Pakistan-based > nuclear procurement network, which extended into Europe, shows how even > friendly governments can fail to guard against the theft and smuggling > of sensitive nuclear technology.
>
> Reducing global nuclear arsenals is a key to keeping such weapons out > of the hands of terrorists. Through the Cooperative Threat Reduction > program, the United States and Russia have succeeded in finding, > consolidating, and securing about half of Russia's nuclear bombs and > fissile material in just over a decade. European countries have also > pledged to aid this effort to ensure that existing nuclear materials > are kept out of the hands of terrorist groups. But bureaucratic and > legal disputes, as well as inadequate funding, have frequently slowed
> the process.
>
> The problem of unsecured fissile material is not confined to Russia, > however. More than 1,400 metric tons of highly enriched uranium and > approximately 500 tons of plutonium are distributed worldwide at some > 140 sites, in unguarded civilian power plants and university research > reactors, as well as in military facilities. The first report of the > International Panel on Fissile Materials in September 2006 focused on > the ease with which unauthorized groups, including terrorist groups,

> could obtain sufficient highly enriched uranium to make nuclear or > radiological bombs.
>
> The prospect of civilian nuclear power development in countries around > the world raises further concerns about the availability of nuclear > materials. Growth in nuclear power is anticipated to be especially high > in Asia, where Japan is planning to bring on line five new plants by > 2010, and China intends to build 30 nuclear reactors by 2020. Over the > next five years, some two-dozen nuclear power plants are scheduled to > be refurbished or rebuilt worldwide, and countries as diverse as > Nigeria, Poland, and Vietnam have expressed interest in nuclear energy.
> In November 2006, the IAEA announced that four Mideast
> nations--Algeria, Egypt, Morocco, and Saudi Arabia--had declared their > intentions to embark on nuclear energy programs.
>
> Several factors are driving the turn to nuclear power--aging nuclear > reactors, rising energy demands, a desire to diversify energy > portfolios and reduce reliance on fossil fuels, and the need to reduce > carbon emissions that cause climate change. Yet expansion of nuclear > power increases the risks of nuclear proliferation. Enrichment > facilities that produce low-enriched uranium for reactor fuel can be > easily modified to produce weapons-usable, highly enriched uranium.
> Moreover, spent plutonium fuel from reactors is weapons-usable after > reprocessing. It does not require much nuclear material to construct a > fissile weapon: 1 to 3 kilograms of plutonium or 5 to 10 kilograms of > highly enriched uranium is all that is needed for a single bomb.
> The international community faces a dilemma: How to mitigate climate > change without increasing the dangers of nuclear materials > proliferation.
>
> Global warming poses a dire threat to human civilization that is second > only to nuclear weapons. The most authoritative scientific group on > these issues, the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC), has > concluded, ﷺMost of the warming observed over the last 50 years is > attributable to human activities.ﷺ Carbon dioxide, principally from > fossil fuel burning, has been accumulating in the atmosphere, where it > acts like a blanket keeping Earth warm and heating up its surface, > ocean, and atmosphere. As a result, current levels of carbon dioxide in > the atmosphere are higher than at any time during the last 650,000 > years.
> Observations of changes in the atmosphere, on land, in the oceans, in > glaciers, and in polar ice cores have led to worldwide scientific > consensus about the causes of climate change. The most distinguished > scientific bodies in the United States, including the National Academy > of Sciences, the American Meteorological Society, and the American > Association for the Advancement of Science have come to conclusions > similar to those of the IPCC.

> Disruptions in climate already appear to be happening faster in some > regions than earlier predicted. In some areas warming has interrupted > normal patterns, allowing insects to spread into new habitats, carrying > diseases and destroying flora and fauna in zones that have no > evolutionary protection. Through flooding or desertification, climate > change threatens the habitats and agricultural resources that societies > depend upon for survival. Coral reefs will disappear, forest fires will > be more intense and more frequent, and heat waves and storms more > damaging. In coming years, coastal cities will bear the brunt of > sea-level rise, as we have already witnessed in New Orleans, compelling > major shifts in human settlement patterns. As such, climate change is > also likely to contribute to mass migrations and even to wars over > arable land, water, and other natural resources.
> Indeed, a business as usual scenario--wherein we take no further > measures to reduce greenhouse gas emissions--would raise the global > temperature 2.8 degrees Celsius (5 degrees Fahrenheit) by the end of > the century, causing a sea-level rise of about 80 feet. The United > States would lose most of its cities on the East Coast: Boston, New > York, Philadelphia, Washington, and Miami, and nearly the whole state > of Florida. China would have 250 million displaced people; India, 150 > million.
>
> Because climate change is a global problem, it will require global > action. As China and India develop their economies, for example, they > will need to find ways to reduce or neutralize their contributions of > carbon dioxide to the atmosphere. Currently, however, the United States > is the single largest producer of carbon dioxide emissions in the > world. Efforts in this one country would have disproportionately large > effects on world climate. As a wealthy and technologically advanced > country, the United States is well positioned to reduce its carbon > emissions.
>
> Such reductions do not necessarily depend upon nuclear power as a > panacea. Carbon emissions can be cut by implementing auto emissions > limits, reducing subsidies for oil and coal production, supporting > carbon-trading regimes, increasing taxes on gasoline, increasing energy > efficiency by establishing manufacturing standards for appliances and > lightbulbs, subsidizing solar and wind power development, and planting > more trees, among others. Government funding and private investments > are required to develop innovative technologies, such as fuel cells, > biomass, and carbon sequestration. If we do not take measures in the > next several years to reduce carbon emissions, the costs of disruption > from climate change could be as high as 5 percent of global gross > domestic product (GDP) each year, according to the October 2006 report > authored by British economist Nicholas Stern. By contrast, the costs of > mitigating climate change could be limited to about 1 percent of global > GDP each year.

> Turning back the Clock will depend on humanity's ability to think in > new ways about how to cooperate to achieve common goals. We ask > scientists, in the words of Eugene Rabinowitch, not to "retire in > resignation and despair to their laboratories" but to publicly engage > technical advice. We urge immediate attention to climate change and > caution those who believe nuclear energy is a problem-free solution.

> Finally, and most importantly, we call upon policy and opinion leaders, > business and civic leaders, and the public to place the dangers of > nuclear weapons at the top of their agendas for action.
>
> More specifically, major progress toward a safer world would include:
> Reducing the launch readiness of U.S. and Russian nuclear forces, and > completely removing nuclear weapons from the day-to-day operations of > their militaries;
> Reducing the number of nuclear weapons by dismantling, storing, and > destroying more than 20,000 warheads over the next 10 years;
> Greatly increasing efforts to locate, store, and secure nuclear > materials in Russia, the United States, and elsewhere. The Cooperative > Threat Reduction program has provided an example of how even former > adversaries can cooperate to reduce the dangers of nuclear weapons.
> Extending the principles of that program, including working side by > side with other countries, establishing transparency, and initiating > partnerships between government and the private sector to downblend > highly enriched uranium, would be constructive;
> Disavowing the development of new nuclear weapons and ratifying the > Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty (CTBT). To date, the CTBT has been > ratified by 137 nations, but notable holdouts include the United > States, China, India, Pakistan, North Korea, and Israel;
> Stopping production of nuclear weapons material, including highly > enriched uranium and plutonium--whether in military or civilian > facilities. The proposed Fissile Material Cutoff Treaty should be taken > up by the nuclear powers as a major step toward achieving this goal;
> Engaging in serious and candid discussion about the potential expansion > of nuclear power worldwide. As a means of addressing the threats from > climate change, nuclear power should be considered as an alternative > energy source. While nuclear energy production does not produce carbon > dioxide, it does raise other significant concerns, such as the health > and environmental hazards of nuclear waste, the production of nuclear > materials that can be diverted to the production of weapons, and the > safety and security of the plants themselves. As such, any > contemplation of the expansion of nuclear power must be predicated upon
> a thorough assessment of the technological and legislative safeguards > required to curb these risks;
> Providing nuclear fuel for energy production in ways that drastically > reduce the risk of spreading nuclear weapons. A number of arrangements > have been proposed, beginning with the Acheson-Lilienthal Plan of 1946.

> More recent plans have called for international consortia that would > oversee the production, distribution, storage, and disposal of nuclear > materials;
> Implementing stricter controls over trade in and shipment of nuclear > technologies and materials. Harmonizing domestic laws across countries > and enforcing these uniformly, as required under U.N. Security Council > Resolution 1540, would be a step in the right direction;
> Building on the strengths and successes of the IAEA by giving more > authority to the agency to monitor and inspect nuclear facilities > worldwide and by providing more financial and staff resources. The > agency already has shown that it can effectively dismantle nuclear > weapons programs and monitor internal developments over a period of > years, as it did in Iraq from 1991 to 2001. It has proven its capacity > and should be rewarded and its programs expanded;
> Providing meaningful international fora to spur innovative solutions

> 2007
> The world stands at the brink of a second nuclear age. The United > States and Russia remain ready to stage a nuclear attack within > minutes, North Korea conducts a nuclear test, and many in the > international community worry that Iran plans to acquire the Bomb.
> Climate change also presents a dire challenge to humanity. Damage to > ecosystems is already taking place; flooding, destructive storms, > increased drought, and polar ice melt are causing loss of life and > property.
>
> IT IS 7 MINUTES TO MIDNIGHT
> 2002

> Concerns regarding a nuclear terrorist attack underscore the enormous > amount of unsecured--and sometimes unaccounted for--weapon-grade > nuclear materials located throughout the world. Meanwhile, the United > States expresses a desire to design new nuclear weapons, with an > emphasis on those able to destroy hardened and deeply buried targets.
> It also rejects a series of arms control treaties and announces it will > withdraw from the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty.
>
> IT IS 9 MINUTES TO MIDNIGHT
> 1998
> India and Pakistan stage nuclear weapons tests only three weeks apart.
> ?The tests are a symptom of the failure of the international community > to fully commit itself to control the spread of nuclear weapons?and to > work toward substantial reductions in the numbers of these weapons,? a > dismayed Bulletin reports. Russia and the United States continue to > serve as poor examples to the rest of the world. Together, they still > maintain 7,000 warheads ready to fire at each other within 15 minutes.
>
> IT IS 14 MINUTES TO MIDNIGHT
> 1995
> Hopes for a large post-Cold War peace dividend and a renouncing of > nuclear weapons fade. Particularly in the United States, hard-liners > seem reluctant to soften their rhetoric or actions, as they claim that > a resurgent Russia could provide as much of a threat as the Soviet > Union. Such talk slows the rollback in global nuclear forces; more than > 40,000 nuclear weapons remain worldwide. There is also concern that > terrorists could exploit poorly secured nuclear facilities in the > former Soviet Union.
>
> IT IS 17 MINUTES TO MIDNIGHT
> 1991
> With the Cold War officially over, the United States and Russia begin > making deep cuts to their nuclear arsenals. The Strategic Arms > Reduction Treaty greatly reduces the number of strategic nuclear > weapons deployed by the two former adversaries. Better still, a series > of unilateral initiatives remove most of the intercontinental ballistic > missiles and bombers in both countries from hair-trigger alert. ?The > illusion that tens of thousands of nuclear weapons are a guarantor of > national security has been stripped away,? the Bulletin declares.
> IT IS 10 MINUTES TO MIDNIGHT

> As one Eastern European country after another (Poland, Czechoslovakia, > Hungary, Romania) frees itself from Soviet control, Soviet General > Secretary Mikhail Gorbachev refuses to intervene, halting the

> Doomsday Clock Hand to Move
>
> 16 January 2007 | 12:55 PM
> The Bulletin of Atomic Scientists (BAS) will move the minute hand of > the "Doomsday Clock" on January 17, 2007, the first such change to the > Clock since February 2002. The major new step reflects growing concerns > about a "Second Nuclear Age" marked by grave threats, including:

> nuclear ambitions in Iran and North Korea, unsecured nuclear materials > in Russia and elsewhere, the continuing "launch-ready" status of 2,000 > of the 25,000 nuclear weapons held by the U.S. and Russia, escalating > terrorism, and new pressure from climate change for expanded civilian > nuclear power that could increase proliferation risks.
>
> The BAS news event will take place simultaneously on January 17 at 9:30
> ET at the American Association for the Advancement of Science in > Washington, D.C., and at 2:30 GMT in London at the Royal Society in > London.
>
> News event speakers will include:
> Stephen Hawking, professor of mathematics at the University of > Cambridge, and a fellow of The Royal Society
> Kennette Benedict, executive director, Bulletin of Atomic Scientists
> Sir Martin Rees, president of The Royal Society, and professor of > cosmology and astrophysics and master of Trinity College at the > University of Cambridge
> Lawrence M. Krauss, professor of physics and astronomy at Case Western > Reserve University
> Ambassador Thomas Pickering, a BAS director and co-chair of the > International Crisis Group
> A live, two-way satellite feed (with full Q&A) will connect the > Washington, D.C., and London news events
> To Participate In Person: You can join us for the simultaneous, > two-site news event taking place on January 17, 2007 at 9:30 a.m. ET,

You know what I am waiting for? (hint, I like watching idiots and using sarcasm) I am waiting for them to get over to rec.radio.amateur."something".moderated and startup attempting to ignore the world again; I am waiting for them to attempt to exert the type of control they have practiced for decades, etc. ...

Damn. I just hope they drop back here and watch us reading them and laughing our b*tts off! <grin>

To Whom It May Concern:

There seems much debate here on the "policy", criteria and form of amateur exams. Some feel ancient ones should be used, for example, how to construct a spark gap xmitter. Others feel you should be required to demonstrate you can write a novel (essay tests) and these fellows are most likely to be english professors--where your use of proper spelling, grammar, sentence structure, etc. are important to your profession you are studying for (however, this is absolutely NOT important to construct, repair nor even operate ham gear.) Others feel you should just make the test "damn hard", so as to replace the difficulty lost when morse falls.

Most if not ALL who argue ANY of the above are sheer idiots. Once again, they prove what they are, who they are, their intentions and just what a wart on amateur radios A$$ THEY ARE ...

The test should simply cover what is necessary. But again, you are NOT going to be able to trust these individuals as they have argued morse is necessary--and now they have been proved wrong.

They will now argue insane methods and ways to construct ridiculous tests. Let us keep from allowing the fox to run the hen house!

Isn't anyone watching these guys and keeping them out of trouble? (or, what kind of nut house are they running here?)

JS

You said (quote):
"Seems to me that a ham who is a jack-of-all-trades-
and-master-of-none would be more valuable to the
"service" than one who is ignorant of most trades
and master of one."

Paraphrasing, you say that a well rounded ham is best for the ham service.

That use of the word "service" is found often in ham text but doesn't fit either of your definitions. The word service as used in this way is ham jargon and refers to all hams as a group. IMO it seems to over inflate our importance. My comment was simply that we're really just a hobby and not all that important anymore.

That was my third attempt at trying to get that particular point across. I'll be happy to discuss with you or anyone else our real importance as a hobby group (or service if you prefer), but you now have the last word on the semantics...

>>Hands to move forward on 'Doomsday Clock'
>>Monday, January 15, 2007
>>The keepers of the so-called 'Doomsday Clock' plan to move its hands >>forward for the first time in four years, saying worsening nuclear and >>climate threats have brought the world closer to atomic Armageddon.
>>
>>The Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists said now was the ``most perilous >>period'' since the bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki.
>>
>>Since 1947 the clock, with midnight representing nuclear apocalypse, >>has appeared on the cover of the magazine, which was founded by >>University of Chicago scientists alarmed about the dangers of the >>nuclear age.
>>The minute hand was last moved in February 2002, when it was pushed >>forward by two minutes, to seven minutes to midnight.
>>
>>Theoretical physicist Stephen Hawking will be among scientists to speak >>on Wednesday when the BAS announces how far the hands will be moved >>this time.
>>The magazine said the ``major step'' reflected growing concerns about a >>``second nuclear age'' marked by grave threats including nuclear >>ambitions in Iran and North Korea and unsecured nuclear materials in >>Russia and elsewhere.
>>The continuing ``launch-ready'' status of 2,000 of the 25,000 nuclear >>weapons held by the US and Russia, was also a problem, as was >>escalating terrorism.
>>
>>The BAS said new pressure from climate change for expanded civilian >>nuclear power could increase proliferation risks.
>>
>>The closest the clock has come to midnight is just two minutes away.

>>That was in 1953, when the US and the Soviet Union tested thermonuclear >>devices within nine months of each other.
>>
>>In 1991, in a wave of optimism at the end of the Cold War, it was set
>>the furthest away, at 17 minutes away to midnight

>>The Doomsday Clock: Nuclear threat to world 'rising'
>>
>>For 60 years, it has depicted how close the world is to nuclear >>disaster. Today, scientists will move its hands forward to show we are >>facing the gravest threat in at least 20 years
>>Wednesday, January 17, 2007
>>
>>By Rupert Cornwell in Washington
>>
>>Five years of international headlines tell of growing turmoil in the >>Middle East, international terrorism in Western capitals and more >>countries seeking the ultimate national security insurance policy.
>>
>>Now climate change and oil insecurity is driving countries to seek >>nuclear power, bringing with it new dangers of proliferation in >>volatile parts of the globe.
>>
>>Today the Doomsday Clock, devised by the Chicago-based Bulletin of the >>Atomic Scientists in 1947 at the dawn of the nuclear age, will make >>official what most thinking citizens feel in their bones - that the >>world has edged closer to nuclear Armageddon than at any time since the >>most precarious moments of the Cold War in the early 1980s.
>>
>>At 2.30pm, simultaneous events will take place in London and Washington >>at which the symbolic clock will be moved forward from its present >>seven minutes to midnight, where it has stood since 2002. The reasons >>for the time being advanced five years ago were crumbling arms control >>treaties and a terrorist threat brought into shattering relief by 9/11.
>>
>>
>>At the start of 2007, not only is the picture darker on both those >>scores. The nuclear threat has also acquired an added and >>unquantifiable dimension, thanks to global warming - prompting the >>Bulletin to warn of a "Second Nuclear Age". The existing dangers could >>not be more obvious: the problem is where to start. What about Iran's >>quest for nuclear weapons, and the thinly veiled warnings from the >>undeclared but assumed nuclear power Israel that it will strike first >>to remove what it sees as an existentialist threat comparable to the >>Holocaust?

>>Or the nuclear test last year by North Korea, a member of George Bush's >>"axis of evil", which could have neighbouring Japan and South Korea >>seeking protection with nuclear weapons of their own? Or the nuclear >>arsenal of unstable Pakistan, where Islamic extremists have staged >>several assassination attempts against President Pervez Musharraf?
>>
>>Or - perhaps the greatest danger of all - that having visited >>conventional terror on an unprecedented scale upon New York City on 11 >>September 2001, al-Qa'ida or some similar organisation will either get >>hold of a ready-made nuclear device or build one of its own, and then >>use it?
>>
>>And why not? Grave doubts surround Russia's ability to secure its >>nuclear materials, many of them dating from the Soviet era, and to >>prevent its nuclear scientists from selling their skills to the highest >>bidder. If a terrorist group did explode even a crude dirty bomb (and >>the US claims to have disrupted such plots) the taboo that has >>prevented states from using nuclear weapons in anger since 1945 might >>be broken.
>>And in this new nuclear age, the deterrence doctrine of "mutually >>assured destruction", or MAD, that kept the Cold War cold, would not >>apply. The US and Russia may have 2,000 launch-ready weapons between >>them - but these would be of no more use against an amorphous terrorist >>group than Israel's nuclear arsenal against the Palestinians. Even so, >>a threshold would have been crossed and a regional, even generalised >>nuclear war, would become conceivable.
>>
>>In 1947, the Doomsday Clock was first set at seven minutes to midnight, >>exactly where it has stood since 2002. On the Bulletin's reckoning, the >>planet's closest brush thus far with Armageddon came in 1953, when the >>clock's hand moved to two minutes to midnight after the US and the >>Soviet Union tested hydrogen bombs within nine months of each other.
>>
>>Thereafter the clock has tracked the chills and thaws of the Cold War, >>and the successive arrival of Britain, France, China, India and >>Pakistan as recognised nuclear powers. The hand reached its "safest" >>point - 17 minutes to Armageddon - in 1991 when the US and the >>soon-to-disappear Soviet Union signed the Strategic Arms Reduction >>Treaty (START), and that year's Gulf War, driving Saddam Hussein from >>Kuwait, seemed to herald an era when the great powers could work >>together under the auspices of the UN. The 2003 Iraq invasion destroyed >>any such illusions. Once there were five proven nuclear powers. Now >>there are nine.
>>
>>Global warming, argues the Bulletin, indirectly increases this risk.
>>Civil nuclear power, which produces no greenhouse gases, is back in >>fashion and hundreds of nuclear reactors will be built. Yet enriched >>uranium, to power them, and plutonium are also the vital raw materials >>for nuclear weapons.

>>
>>In this Second Nuclear Age, there will be more of these deadly >>commodities around. Small wonder the hand on the Doomsday Clock will >>move towards midnight. The only question is, how close will it get?

>>5 Minutes to Midnight
>>http://www.thebulletin.org/minutes-to-midnight/
>>Overview
>>
>>The Bulletin of the Atomic Scientistsï¿½ Doomsday Clock conveys how >>close humanity is to catastrophic destruction--the figurative >>midnight--and monitors the means humankind could use to obliterate >>itself. First and foremost, these include nuclear weapons, but they >>also encompass climate-changing technologies and new developments in >>the life sciences and nanotechnology that could inflict irrevocable >>harm.
>>
>>Nuclear
>>
>>For four decades, the United Statesï¿½ and the Soviet Unionï¿½s overt >>hostility coupled with their enormous nuclear arsenals defined the >>nuclear threat. The equation for nuclear holocaust was simple:
>>Heightened tensions between the two jittery superpowers would lead to >>an all-out nuclear exchange. Today, the potential for an accidental or >>inadvertent nuclear exchange between the United States and Russia
>>remains, with both countries anachronistically maintaining more than >>1,000 warheads on high alert, ready to launch within tens of minutes.
>>But a deliberate attack by Russia or the United States on the other is >>unthinkable.
>>Unfortunately, however, the possibility of a nuclear exchange between >>countries remains. In 1999 and again in 2001, India and Pakistan >>threatened each other with nuclear arms. And despite past successes in >>limiting the spread of nuclear weapons to countries around the world, >>nuclear proliferation seems to present a great danger today, with >>countries such as North Korea and Iran actively pursuing the capability >>to produce nuclear weapons. Nuclear terrorism also poses a new risk, as >>fissile materials remain unsecured in many parts of the world, making >>them more available to groups that seek destructive means.
>>
>>Environmental
>>

>>Fossil-fuel technologies such as coal-burning plants powered the >>industrial revolution, bringing unparalleled economic prosperity to >>many parts of the world. In the 1950s, however, scientists began >>measuring year-to-year changes in the carbon dioxide concentration in >>the atmosphere that they could relate to fossil fuel combustion, and >>they began to develop the implications for Earthï¿½s temperature and for >>climate change.
>>Fifty years later, leading scientists agree that carbon-burning
>>technologies continue to make Earth warmer at an unprecedented rate.
>>They warn that the consequences could drastically alter both the planet
>>and human life. Already, ice packs in Greenland are rapidly >>disappearing, which, in turn, threatens the existence of hundreds of >>species such as polar bears and the traditions of whole societies such >>as the Inuit. The future looks even bleaker, as scientists continue to >>observe cascading effects on Earthï¿½s complex ecosystems.
>>
>>Emerging Technologies
>>Advances in genetics and biology over the last five decades have >>inspired a host of new possibilities--both positive and troubling. With >>greater understanding of genetic material and of how physiological
>>systems interact, biologists can fight disease better and improve >>overall human health. But this knowledge may also afford opportunities >>to program organisms to do our bidding for malign purposes by >>manipulating brain functions, compromising bioregulation, and even by >>altering our reproductive capabilities. Complicating matters further, >>more groups and more individuals possess these high-consequence >>technologies than in the past--and more and more people will acquire >>them in the future. The emergence of nanotechnology--manufacturing at >>the molecular or atomic level--presents similar concerns, especially if >>coupled with chemical and biological weapons, explosives, or missiles.
>>Such combinations could result in highly destructive missiles the size >>of an insect and microscopic delivery systems for dangerous pathogens.
>>

>>Board Statement
>>
>>17 January 2007
>>We stand at the brink of a second nuclear age. Not since the first >>atomic bombs were dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki has the world faced >>such perilous choices. North Koreaï¿½s recent test of a nuclear weapon, >>Iranï¿½s nuclear ambitions, a renewed U.S. emphasis on the military >>utility of nuclear weapons, the failure to adequately secure nuclear >>materials, and the continued presence of some 26,000 nuclear weapons in >>the United States and Russia are symptomatic of a larger failure to >>solve the problems posed by the most destructive technology on Earth.
>>As in past deliberations, we have examined other human-made threats to >>civilization. We have concluded that the dangers posed by climate >>change are nearly as dire as those posed by nuclear weapons. The >>effects may be less dramatic in the short term than the destruction

>>that could be wrought by nuclear explosions, but over the next three to >>four decades climate change could cause drastic harm to the habitats >>upon which human societies depend for survival.
>>
>>This deteriorating state of global affairs leads the Board of Directors >>of the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists--in consultation with a Board >>of Sponsors that includes 18 Nobel laureates--to move the minute hand >>of the ï¿½Doomsday Clockï¿½ from seven to five minutes to midnight.
>>
>>
>>Nuclear weapons present the most grave challenge to humanity, enabling >>genocide with the press of a button. In 1945, scientists warned the >>world about the nearly unimaginable destructive power of the atomic >>bombs they had created. As Eugene Rabinowitch, one of the cofounders of >>the Bulletin, wrote, ï¿½The Bulletinï¿½s Clock is not a gauge to register
>>the ups and downs of the international power struggle; it is intended >>to reflect basic changes in the level of continuous danger in which >>mankind lives in the nuclear age, and will continue living, until >>society adjusts its basic attitudes and institutions.ï¿½ As inheritors
>>and trustees of the Clock, we seek to warn the world that this level of >>danger has escalated precipitously.
>>
>>The second nuclear era, unlike the dawn of the first nuclear age in >>1945, is characterized by a world of porous national borders, rapid >>communications that facilitate the spread of technical knowledge, and
>>expanded commerce in potentially dangerous dual-use technologies and >>materials. The Pakistan-based network that provided nuclear >>technologies to Libya, North Korea, and Iran is an example of the new >>challenges confronting the international community.
>>The current period of globalization coincides with an erosion of the >>global agreements and norms that have constrained the spread of nuclear >>weapons since 1970 when the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) came >>into force. The NPT provided standards, set up protocols for >>inspections and regulation through the International Atomic Energy >>Agency (IAEA), and held out a promise of disarmament by the nuclear >>powers in exchange for restraint by those countries that did not have >>nuclear weapons. Compliance has always been voluntary, and until the >>last five years, nearly all governments felt that their interests were >>served by adhering to the NPT provisions. The 2005 NPT Review >>Conference, however, ended in failure, without any consensus on the >>core issues of verification of safeguards on national nuclear programs,
>>the peaceful use of nuclear power, and disarmament.
>>
>>Iran, which is a signatory state of the NPT, has violated its IAEA
>>obligations and obstructed efforts to determine the extent of its >>activities. North Korea, which withdrew from the NPT in 2003, followed >>through on its declared intention to test a nuclear weapon three years >>later. Although this test prompted stern global condemnation, the >>international community essentially acquiesced. The dominant concern >>was that North Korea might sell its nuclear weapons abroad. In effect, >>the message from the international community was ï¿½donï¿½t proliferateï¿½ >>rather than ï¿½donï¿½t become a nuclear power.ï¿½ In this regard, the >>North Korean test was doubly dangerous and sets an unfortunate example >>for other would-be nuclear powers.

>>The five NPT-recognized nuclear weapon states have failed in their >>obligation to make serious strides toward disarmament--most notably,
>>the United States and Russia, which still possess 26,000 of the 27,000 >>nuclear warheads in the world. By far the greatest potential for >>calamity lies in the readiness of forces in the United States and >>Russia to fight an all-out nuclear war. Whether by accident or by >>unauthorized launch, these two countries are able to initiate major >>strikes in a matter of minutes. Each warhead has the potential >>destructive force of 8 to 40 times that of the atomic bomb dropped on >>Hiroshima, Japan, on August 6, 1945. In that relatively small nuclear >>explosion, 100,000 people were killed and a city destroyed; 50 of >>todayï¿½s nuclear weapons could kill 200 million people.
>>While the possibility of launching these powerful weapons may seem >>remote, experts in Russia and the United States are concerned about >>command and control systems that depend on complex electronic >>communications and information. Past incidents suggest that technical >>failures, misperception, and miscommunication happen in even the >>best-maintained systems. Such errors could lead to an accidental launch >>already programmed in the event of attack. Experts have documented four >>nuclear false alarms--in 1979, 1980, 1983, and 1995--where either the >>United States or Soviet/Russian forces were placed on the highest alert >>and missile launch crews were given preliminary launch warnings.
>>Sixteen years after the end of the Cold War, following substantial >>reductions in nuclear weapons by the United States and Russia, the two >>major powers have now stalled in their progress toward deeper >>reductions in their arsenals. Equally worrisome, the United States, in >>its 2002 Nuclear Posture Review, declared that nuclear weapons
>>ï¿½provide credible military options to deter a wide range of threats,ï¿½ >>including chemical and biological weapons, as well as ï¿½surprising >>military developments.ï¿½ In early 2004, this new concept, which >>espouses the quick use of even nuclear weapons to destroy ï¿½time urgent >>targets,ï¿½ was put into operation. That the United States--a nation >>with unmatched superiority in conventional weapons--would place renewed
>>emphasis on the need for nuclear weapons suggests to other nations that >>such arsenals are necessary to their security.
>>
>>In the face of the major powersï¿½ continued reliance on nuclear >>weapons, other nations are following suit. Since the end of the Cold

>>War, three countries have announced the possession of nuclear >>weapons--India, Pakistan, and North Korea. Israel possesses weapons but >>chooses not to declare them. The director of the IAEA, Mohamed >>ElBaradei, believes up to 30 countries have the capacity, and >>increasingly the motivation, to develop nuclear weapons in a very short >>time span.
>>
>>Such developments have prompted some to declare the NPT a ï¿½failure.ï¿½
>>Yet this assessment ignores the decades-long success of the treaty in >>stemming nuclear proliferation. In 1963, President John F. Kennedy >>warned of the possibility of the United States facing a world ï¿½in >>which 15 or 20 or 25 nationsï¿½ would have nuclear weapons. In the >>decades following the entry into force of the NPT, only six countries
>>have embarked on nuclear weapons programs and many others have shut >>down their programs, including Argentina, Brazil, Libya, and South >>Africa.
>>
>>Even at the height of the Cold War, President Kennedy worried about >>U.S. alliesï¿½ acquisition of nuclear weapons technology. In recent >>years, however, the United States appears focused on denying nuclear >>weapons only to its adversaries, while accommodating its friends. Yet,
>>as history demonstrates, countries that are deemed allies can quickly >>become adversaries. And the success of the illicit, Pakistan-based >>nuclear procurement network, which extended into Europe, shows how even >>friendly governments can fail to guard against the theft and smuggling >>of sensitive nuclear technology.
>>
>>Reducing global nuclear arsenals is a key to keeping such weapons out >>of the hands of terrorists. Through the Cooperative Threat Reduction >>program, the United States and Russia have succeeded in finding, >>consolidating, and securing about half of Russiaï¿½s nuclear bombs and >>fissile material in just over a decade. European countries have also >>pledged to aid this effort to ensure that existing nuclear materials >>are kept out of the hands of terrorist groups. But bureaucratic and >>legal disputes, as well as inadequate funding, have frequently slowed
>>the process.
>>
>>The problem of unsecured fissile material is not confined to Russia, >>however. More than 1,400 metric tons of highly enriched uranium and >>approximately 500 tons of plutonium are distributed worldwide at some >>140 sites, in unguarded civilian power plants and university research >>reactors, as well as in military facilities. The first report of the >>International Panel on Fissile Materials in September 2006 focused on >>the ease with which unauthorized groups, including terrorist groups,
>>could obtain sufficient highly enriched uranium to make nuclear or >>radiological bombs.
>>
>>The prospect of civilian nuclear power development in countries around
>>the world raises further concerns about the availability of nuclear >>materials. Growth in nuclear power is anticipated to be especially high

>>in Asia, where Japan is planning to bring on line five new plants by >>2010, and China intends to build 30 nuclear reactors by 2020. Over the >>next five years, some two-dozen nuclear power plants are scheduled to >>be refurbished or rebuilt worldwide, and countries as diverse as >>Nigeria, Poland, and Vietnam have expressed interest in nuclear energy.
>>In November 2006, the IAEA announced that four Mideast
>>nations--Algeria, Egypt, Morocco, and Saudi Arabia--had declared their >>intentions to embark on nuclear energy programs.
>>
>>Several factors are driving the turn to nuclear power--aging nuclear >>reactors, rising energy demands, a desire to diversify energy
>>portfolios and reduce reliance on fossil fuels, and the need to reduce >>carbon emissions that cause climate change. Yet expansion of nuclear >>power increases the risks of nuclear proliferation. Enrichment >>facilities that produce low-enriched uranium for reactor fuel can be >>easily modified to produce weapons-usable, highly enriched uranium.
>>Moreover, spent plutonium fuel from reactors is weapons-usable after >>reprocessing. It does not require much nuclear material to construct a >>fissile weapon: 1 to 3 kilograms of plutonium or 5 to 10 kilograms of >>highly enriched uranium is all that is needed for a single bomb.
>>The international community faces a dilemma: How to mitigate climate >>change without increasing the dangers of nuclear materials >>proliferation.
>>
>>Global warming poses a dire threat to human civilization that is second >>only to nuclear weapons. The most authoritative scientific group on >>these issues, the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC), has >>concluded, ï¿½Most of the warming observed over the last 50 years is >>attributable to human activities.ï¿½ Carbon dioxide, principally from >>fossil fuel burning, has been accumulating in the atmosphere, where it >>acts like a blanket keeping Earth warm and heating up its surface, >>ocean, and atmosphere. As a result, current levels of carbon dioxide in >>the atmosphere are higher than at any time during the last 650,000 >>years.
>>
>>Observations of changes in the atmosphere, on land, in the oceans, in >>glaciers, and in polar ice cores have led to worldwide scientific >>consensus about the causes of climate change. The most distinguished >>scientific bodies in the United States, including the National Academy >>of Sciences, the American Meteorological Society, and the American >>Association for the Advancement of Science have come to conclusions >>similar to those of the IPCC.
>>Disruptions in climate already appear to be happening faster in some >>regions than earlier predicted. In some areas warming has interrupted >>normal patterns, allowing insects to spread into new habitats, carrying >>diseases and destroying flora and fauna in zones that have no >>evolutionary protection. Through flooding or desertification, climate >>change threatens the habitats and agricultural resources that societies

>>depend upon for survival. Coral reefs will disappear, forest fires will >>be more intense and more frequent, and heat waves and storms more >>damaging. In coming years, coastal cities will bear the brunt of >>sea-level rise, as we have already witnessed in New Orleans, compelling >>major shifts in human settlement patterns. As such, climate change is >>also likely to contribute to mass migrations and even to wars over >>arable land, water, and other natural resources.
>>
>>Indeed, a ï¿½business as usualï¿½ scenario--wherein we take no further >>measures to reduce greenhouse gas emissions--would raise the global >>temperature 2.8 degrees Celsius (5 degrees Fahrenheit) by the end of >>the century, causing a sea-level rise of about 80 feet. The United >>States would lose most of its cities on the East Coast: Boston, New >>York, Philadelphia, Washington, and Miami, and nearly the whole state >>of Florida. China would have 250 million displaced people; India, 150 >>million.
>>
>>Because climate change is a global problem, it will require global >>action. As China and India develop their economies, for example, they >>will need to find ways to reduce or neutralize their contributions of >>carbon dioxide to the atmosphere. Currently, however, the United States >>is the single largest producer of carbon dioxide emissions in the >>world. Efforts in this one country would have disproportionately large >>effects on world climate. As a wealthy and technologically advanced >>country, the United States is well positioned to reduce its carbon >>emissions.
>>
>>Such reductions do not necessarily depend upon nuclear power as a >>panacea. Carbon emissions can be cut by implementing auto emissions >>limits, reducing subsidies for oil and coal production, supporting >>carbon-trading regimes, increasing taxes on gasoline, increasing energy >>efficiency by establishing manufacturing standards for appliances and >>lightbulbs, subsidizing solar and wind power development, and planting
>>more trees, among others. Government funding and private investments >>are required to develop innovative technologies, such as fuel cells, >>biomass, and carbon sequestration. If we do not take measures in the >>next several years to reduce carbon emissions, the costs of disruption
>>from climate change could be as high as 5 percent of global gross >>domestic product (GDP) each year, according to the October 2006 report >>authored by British economist Nicholas Stern. By contrast, the costs of >>mitigating climate change could be limited to about 1 percent of global >>GDP each year.
>>
>>Turning back the Clock will depend on humanityï¿½s ability to think in >>new ways about how to cooperate to achieve common goals. We ask >>scientists, in the words of Eugene Rabinowitch, not to "retire in >>resignation and despair to their laboratories" but to publicly engage >>these issues and make their voices heard. And we implore governments to >>actively engage the scientific community for sound, nonpartisan >>technical advice. We urge immediate attention to climate change and >>caution those who believe nuclear energy is a problem-free solution.

>>Finally, and most importantly, we call upon policy and opinion leaders, >>business and civic leaders, and the public to place the dangers of >>nuclear weapons at the top of their agendas for action.
>>
>>More specifically, major progress toward a safer world would include:
>>Reducing the launch readiness of U.S. and Russian nuclear forces, and >>completely removing nuclear weapons from the day-to-day operations of
>>their militaries;
>>Reducing the number of nuclear weapons by dismantling, storing, and >>destroying more than 20,000 warheads over the next 10 years;
>>Greatly increasing efforts to locate, store, and secure nuclear >>materials in Russia, the United States, and elsewhere. The Cooperative >>Threat Reduction program has provided an example of how even former >>adversaries can cooperate to reduce the dangers of nuclear weapons.
>>Extending the principles of that program, including working side by >>side with other countries, establishing transparency, and initiating
>>partnerships between government and the private sector to downblend
>>highly enriched uranium, would be constructive;
>>Disavowing the development of new nuclear weapons and ratifying the >>Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty (CTBT). To date, the CTBT has been >>ratified by 137 nations, but notable holdouts include the United >>States, China, India, Pakistan, North Korea, and Israel;
>>Stopping production of nuclear weapons material, including highly >>enriched uranium and plutonium--whether in military or civilian >>facilities. The proposed Fissile Material Cutoff Treaty should be taken >>up by the nuclear powers as a major step toward achieving this goal;
>>Engaging in serious and candid discussion about the potential expansion >>of nuclear power worldwide. As a means of addressing the threats from >>climate change, nuclear power should be considered as an alternative >>energy source. While nuclear energy production does not produce carbon >>dioxide, it does raise other significant concerns, such as the health >>and environmental hazards of nuclear waste, the production of nuclear >>materials that can be diverted to the production of weapons, and the >>safety and security of the plants themselves. As such, any >>contemplation of the expansion of nuclear power must be predicated upon
>>a thorough assessment of the technological and legislative safeguards
>>required to curb these risks;
>>Providing nuclear fuel for energy production in ways that drastically >>reduce the risk of spreading nuclear weapons. A number of arrangements >>have been proposed, beginning with the Acheson-Lilienthal Plan of 1946.
>>More recent plans have called for international consortia that would >>oversee the production, distribution, storage, and disposal of nuclear >>materials;
>>Implementing stricter controls over trade in and shipment of nuclear >>technologies and materials. Harmonizing domestic laws across countries >>and enforcing these uniformly, as required under U.N. Security Council >>Resolution 1540, would be a step in the right direction;
>>Building on the strengths and successes of the IAEA by giving more
>>authority to the agency to monitor and inspect nuclear facilities

>>worldwide and by providing more financial and staff resources. The >>agency already has shown that it can effectively dismantle nuclear >>weapons programs and monitor internal developments over a period of >>years, as it did in Iraq from 1991 to 2001. It has proven its capacity >>and should be rewarded and its programs expanded;
>>Providing meaningful international fora to spur innovative solutions
>>that halt nuclear proliferation and provide blueprints for radical >>reductions in nuclear weapons worldwide. The NPT Review Conferences >>could provide such an ongoing forum, if nuclear weapon countries would >>recognize the benefits of this institution for impeding the spread of >>lethal technologies.
>>
>>The terrible and still unprecedented destructive power of nuclear >>weapons led Albert Einstein to observe, ï¿½With nuclear weapons, >>everything has changed, save our way of thinking.ï¿½ As we stand at the >>brink of a second nuclear age and at the onset of an era of >>unprecedented climate change, our way of thinking about the uses and >>control of technologies must change to prevent unspeakable destruction >>and future human suffering.

>>IT IS 5 MINUTES TO MIDNIGHT
>>2007
>>The world stands at the brink of a second nuclear age. The United >>States and Russia remain ready to stage a nuclear attack within >>minutes, North Korea conducts a nuclear test, and many in the >>international community worry that Iran plans to acquire the Bomb.
>>Climate change also presents a dire challenge to humanity. Damage to >>ecosystems is already taking place; flooding, destructive storms, >>increased drought, and polar ice melt are causing loss of life and >>property.
>>
>>IT IS 7 MINUTES TO MIDNIGHT
>>2002
>>Concerns regarding a nuclear terrorist attack underscore the enormous >>amount of unsecured--and sometimes unaccounted for--weapon-grade >>nuclear materials located throughout the world. Meanwhile, the United >>States expresses a desire to design new nuclear weapons, with an >>emphasis on those able to destroy hardened and deeply buried targets.
>>It also rejects a series of arms control treaties and announces it will >>withdraw from the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty.
>>
>>1998

>>India and Pakistan stage nuclear weapons tests only three weeks apart.
>>ï¿½The tests are a symptom of the failure of the international community >>to fully commit itself to control the spread of nuclear weaponsï¿½and to >>work toward substantial reductions in the numbers of these weapons,ï¿½ a >>dismayed Bulletin reports. Russia and the United States continue to >>serve as poor examples to the rest of the world. Together, they still >>maintain 7,000 warheads ready to fire at each other within 15 minutes.
>>
>>IT IS 14 MINUTES TO MIDNIGHT
>>1995
>>Hopes for a large post-Cold War peace dividend and a renouncing of >>nuclear weapons fade. Particularly in the United States, hard-liners >>seem reluctant to soften their rhetoric or actions, as they claim that >>a resurgent Russia could provide as much of a threat as the Soviet >>Union. Such talk slows the rollback in global nuclear forces; more than >>40,000 nuclear weapons remain worldwide. There is also concern that

>>ANNOUNCEMENTS
>>Doomsday Clock Hand to Move
>>
>>16 January 2007 | 12:55 PM
>>The Bulletin of Atomic Scientists (BAS) will move the minute hand of >>the "Doomsday Clock" on January 17, 2007, the first such change to the >>Clock since February 2002. The major new step reflects growing concerns >>about a "Second Nuclear Age" marked by grave threats, including:
>>nuclear ambitions in Iran and North Korea, unsecured nuclear materials
>>in Russia and elsewhere, the continuing "launch-ready" status of 2,000 >>of the 25,000 nuclear weapons held by the U.S. and Russia, escalating >>terrorism, and new pressure from climate change for expanded civilian >>nuclear power that could increase proliferation risks.
>>
>>The BAS news event will take place simultaneously on January 17 at 9:30
>>ET at the American Association for the Advancement of Science in >>Washington, D.C., and at 2:30 GMT in London at the Royal Society in >>London.
>>
>>News event speakers will include:
>>Stephen Hawking, professor of mathematics at the University of

>>Cambridge, and a fellow of The Royal Society
>>Kennette Benedict, executive director, Bulletin of Atomic Scientists
>>Sir Martin Rees, president of The Royal Society, and professor of >>cosmology and astrophysics and master of Trinity College at the >>University of Cambridge
>>Lawrence M. Krauss, professor of physics and astronomy at Case Western >>Reserve University
>>Ambassador Thomas Pickering, a BAS director and co-chair of the >>International Crisis Group
>>A live, two-way satellite feed (with full Q&A) will connect the >>Washington, D.C., and London news events
>>To Participate In Person: You can join us for the simultaneous,
>>two-site news event taking place on January 17, 2007 at 9:30 a.m. ET,
>>American Association for the Advancement of Science, Auditorium, 1200
>>New York Avenue NW, Washington, D.C.; and 2:30 p.m. GMT, The Royal >>Society, Wellcome Trust Lecture Hall, 6-9 Carlton House Terrace, >>London. Please RSVP in advance by contacting Patrick Mitchell, (703)
>>276-3266, or pmitchell@hastingsgroup.com.
>>
>>Can't Participate In Person?: In the U.S., reporters can join this >>live, phone-based global news conference at 9:30 a.m. ET on January 17, >>2007 by dialing 1 (800) 860-2442 (Media in and around London should >>dial 0800-028-0531. All other reporters outside of the U.S. and the >>London area should dial 001-412-858-4600, which is not a toll-free

>>Clock Moves Forward Two Minutes
>>
>>15 January 2007 | 10:27 PM
>>The Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists (BAS) is moving the minute hand >>of the Doomsday Clock on January 17, 2007, from 7 to 5 minutes to >>midnight.
>>
>>BAS announced the Clock change at an unprecedented joint news >>conference at the American Association for the Advancement of Science >>in Washington, DC, and the Royal Society in London. In a statement >>supporting the decision to move the hand of the Doomsday Clock, the BAS

>>Board focused on two major sources of catastrophe: the perils of 27,000 >>nuclear weapons, 2000 of them ready to launch within minutes; and the >>destruction of human habitats from climate change.
>>
>>Fourteen leading scientists and security experts writing in the >>January-February issue of the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, >>explore further the potential for catastrophic damage from human-made >>technologies.
>>
>>Created in 1947 by the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, the Doomsday >>Clock has been adjusted only 17 times prior to today, most recently in >>February 2002 after the events of 9/11. At that time, BAS underscored >>the slow progress on global nuclear disarmament.
>>
>>By moving the hand of the Clock closer to midnightï¿½the figurative end >>of civilizationï¿½the BAS Board is drawing attention to the increasing >>dangers from the spread of nuclear weapons in a world of violent >>conflict, and to the catastrophic harm from climate change that is >>unfolding.
>>
>>At the announcement from London, Stephen Hawking, BAS Sponsor, >>professor of mathematics at the University of Cambridge, and a fellow >>of the Royal Society, said: "As scientists, we understand the dangers >>of nuclear weapons and their devastating effects, and we are learning >>how human activities and technologies are affecting climate systems in >>ways that may forever change life on Earth. As citizens of the world, >>we have a duty to alert the public to the unnecessary risks that we >>live with every day, and to the perils we foresee if governments and >>societies do not take action now to render nuclear weapons obsolete and >>to prevent further climate change."
>>
>>>From Washington, Kennette Benedict, executive director of the Bulletin, >>said: "As we stand at the brink of a Second Nuclear Age and at the >>onset of unprecedented climate change, our way of thinking about the >>uses and control of technologies must change to prevent unspeakable >>destruction and future human suffering."
>>
>>Sir Martin Rees, president of The Royal Society, professor of cosmology >>and astrophysics, master of Trinity College at the University of >>Cambridge, and BAS Sponsor said: "Nuclear weapons still pose the most >>catastrophic and immediate threat to humanity, but climate change and >>emerging technologies in the life sciences also have the potential to >>end civilization as we know it."
>>
>>Lawrence M. Krauss, another BAS Sponsor and professor of physics and >>astronomy at Case Western Reserve University, said: "In these dangerous >>times, scientists have a responsibility to speak truth to power >>especially if it might provoke actions to reduce threats from the >>preventable technological dangers currently facing humanity. To do >>anything else would be negligent."

>>
>>Ambassador Thomas Pickering, a BAS director and co-chair of the >>International Crisis Group, said: "Although our current situation is >>dire, we have the means today to successfully address these global >>problems. For example, through vigorous diplomacy and international >>agencies like the International Atomic Energy Agency, we can negotiate >>and implement agreements that could protect us all from the most >>destructive technology on Earthï¿½nuclear weapons."
>>
>>The BAS statement outlines a number of steps that, if taken >>immediately, could help to prevent disaster, including the following:
>>
>>
>>Reduce the launch readiness of U.S. and Russian nuclear forces and >>completely removing nuclear weapons from the day-to-day operations of >>their militaries
>>Reduce the number of nuclear weapons by dismantling, storing, and >>destroying more than 20,000 warheads over the next 10 years, as well as >>greatly increasing efforts to locate, store, and secure nuclear >>materials in Russia and elsewhere
>>Stop production of nuclear weapons material, including highly enriched >>uranium and plutonium--whether in military or civilian facilities >>Engage in serious and candid discussion about the potential expansion >>of nuclear power worldwide
>>
>>Contact: Patrick Mitchell, (703) 276-3266 or >>pmitchell@hastingsgroup.com.
>>
>>Editor's Note: A streaming audio replay of the news event will be >>available on this site (http://www.thebulletin.org) as of 6 p.m. ET >>and 11 p.m. in London/2300 GMT on January 17, 2007.

No, you got it wrong. You left out my quotation marks around the word, "service".

When you finally understand the difference that those quotation marks make in the meaning of the word, "service", you will realize that your prolonged argument is irrelevant at best.

> That use of the word "service" is found often in ham text but doesn't fit either > of your definitions.

Yes, you are finally getting it. That's exactly what happens when one uses quotation marks around a word in the following way:

From Webster's "Basic Manual of (English) Style":
"Use quotation marks: to draw attention to ... a usage very different in style from the context." e.g. different from the context of those ham texts to which you alluded above.

My quote above, quoted by you, puts "service" in quotation marks to draw attention to a usage very different in style from the context that you were using, i.e. service to the public. Why are those quotation marks not drawing your attention to my very different usage? :-)

Perhaps I can offer an explanation. I mean sitting back here in the background, with others I am sure, they demonstrate their lack of education?

I mean, what other explanation is possible?

Just FYI, the frogger with whom you've been exchanging posts is not Mark Morgan, but Wabbit, who may or may not be "Woger" Wiseman (he who tangled with John Kimball & Scott Campbell of alt.flame in past years, and was soundly trounced). Mark only uses "kb9rqz" (his callsign on ham radio) when using said callsign for his domain, or <konstanz@hotmail.com>, and Wabbit is a raving homo-/biphobe, while Mark is an out bisexual, like me. Wabbit is currently a leading favourite to win Coward of the Month for January '07 (his main competition being Robert "Mop Jockey" Wolfe), as he has been frogging or forging Mark from total anonymity (because his identity as Woger cannot be confirmed, only surmised, and I can surmise lots of things that may not be true) since at least last summer.

Well, yes and no. While it is true you must be born with the "gray matter" necessary, it is how you end up using it that really matters.

Education can assist to that goal very nicely. Indeed, it is possible to "educate" a monkey--well, at least to some degree. <puzzled-look>

Commander!

Glad to hear you have advanced and have now gained the mental aptitude to be able to advance guesses!

Now, just keep practicing! Your ability to be correct, or at least close to correct, can now be developed!!!

Keep up the good work, happy with your progress ...

lol. Don't need to believe me, Morkie. Look it up for yourself.

My license had a Rhode Island mailing address long before Riley wrote me (easily verifiable via ULS, not to mention, I believe the online copies of the coorespondence clearly states it was mailed to my RI address) and I still am the holder of a club callsign, actively in use today as a beacon for foxhunts.

Of course, I doubt you'll look it up... Facts would tend to get in the way of your deluded reality.

John, they MUST attack. They aren't respected for their "leadership" (that they claim, either overtly or covertly).
They have a NEED to CONTROL. In der Uber Oberst's case, it seems compounded by a NEED to push others around.

They are, as you say, LITTLE men. Little men act that way. It isn't restricted to amateur radio. It covers all human activity.

I'm sure US amateur radio can be fun. It might be nice to have a ham license other than from the FDA. But NOT in the style these LITTLE men dictate.

Back about 44 or so years ago, it was a Saturday and I had the morning free. Being a nice day outside, I thought to walk two blocks to a Ralphs supermarket and pick up a few things. Our apartment was next to a two-block long public park and the Little League teams were out there warming up. I watched for a while. One of the boys just didn't want to play ball. His jock dad kept harranging him to "get out there!" Boy resisted. Finally dad yelled loudly to him, "You're gonna go out there and enjoy playing whether you like it or not!" <some muffled chuckles from the sidelines>

That jock dad is about like the LITTLE men in here, pretenders at being big-league and trying to control all via paternal terror tactics. It's not about having "fun" in amateur radio, it's about having "controlled fun," i.e., doing as the "jocks" (with cute little amateur uniforms on) say everyone should act, expecting "respect" for being so ruff and tuff, doing as the "jocks" say one "should."

It won't be long now to the final days of amateur morse code testing in the USA. To all those ruff, tuff "jocks," I just flip them the bird. :-)

Him und der Uber Oberst. Yapping about "interested all your life in ham radio and NEVER GOT AN AMATEUR LICENSE!" Oh the SHAME on me! Oh the IMMORALITY of that! :-) :-)

Tsk, some self-appointed Gods of Radio are abysmally ignorant, dysfunctional, and petty.

They were busy, busy, busy doing heavy lifting of EMOTIONAL BAGGAGE hoping it got delivered. It didn't, wasn't addressed to me. But, (at least for Jimmie), they don't understand that I live in reality, not in their little fantasy world where the only radio that exists is amateur radio and radiotelegraphy.

Have you seen the postings by "the man of a thousand callsigns?" He was busy, busy, busy too, trying to handle the same misaddressed emotional baggage. He "never did anything wrong," either...according to his claims. Instead he tries to use "age" as a factor.
Poor braggart, he couldn't handle exposure before and he can't handle it now. Small men with smaller accomplishments trying to be "big."

>>>> He will turn that on its ear and wind up blaming you for >that is sad part in jim's case I truly beleive he does not understand

That IS the tragedy. He wants to be the "newsbringer" as if there are no other sources open for all on radio news. He wants to be some kind of "director" of US amateur radio and dictate who should do what yet he isn't with the ARRL. He wants to be an "insider" to the FCC yet has never been IN the FCC. He wants to impress others that he is "in" the electronics industry yet cannot openly state exactly WHAT he works on even if he doesn't name his employer. He tries to bluff off that he is a "radio manufacturer" yet hasn't given ANY sort of description of those "radios." He wants to be a "military expert" yet has not one microsecond worth of experience with any military branch.

Lots and lots of BLUFF and half-truths. He is a clone of braggart-bully Robesin but with much better English.

Tsk, he gets upset when so few believe him, fewer still who fail to respect him. NOT a good role model for the US amateur radio community.

Only one day more to read the 06-178 Report & Order and find out when the code test goes bye-bye.

Not to worry, Paul Schleck, let the morsemen "moderators" relax a bit. :-) Your "moderated" kaffeklatsch of olde tymers can continue with Days of Yesteryear kvetching.

Heck, Len's comments and reply comments alone amount to dozens if not hundreds of pages.

Consider that some poor soul at FCC had to read all of that...

What I find most amusing is that he took all that trouble to Reply camp.

All sorts of reasons for that. Some consider acting civilized to be a sign of weakness. Others consider being proved wrong to be a humiliation, and lash out at the messenger.

Seems to me that the rational compromise would be to offer a variety of skills tests.

For example, imagine a simple test of voice operating skill where a person being tested has to send a message in standard form and receive one, using standard phonetics and good amateur operating practice.

I would say 25 years.

I think one of the reasons for the recent lack of growth was the popularization of amateur radio as a personal radio service in the 1980s and 1990s. There's nothing wrong with using amateur radio for that purpose, and the repeater/HT/autopatch boom of those years made it practical

A lot of folks who started out that way turned out to be really good hams. Some branched out into other areas of amateur radio, others did not.

But with the proliferation of inexpensive cell phones, that source of new hams has been greatly reduced. Some of those who did get licensed for personal radio reasons have let their licenses lapse because the cell phone does the job now.

That's the old Carl.

The new (post-2001) Carl is a much nicer guy. Very reasonable and well behaved, whether you agree with him or not. Look up some of his more-recent posts and see.

Yes, but that IMO doesn't justify it as a skill test with a pass/fail result.

In fact, with the largest license class being the Tech, it would be more logical to suggest an operating mode commonly in use by the vast majority of techs -- FM voice.

> Why not?

Several reasons. First, CW is but one of many modes in use in the ARS today. I do not feel it is appropriate to weight the CW test heavily in testing, such that it becomes a pass/fail element. Simply put, some people may have no interest in operating CW.

Offhand, I do not recall the percentage of hams actively using CW. I vaguely recall there was a study in the mid 90's. A quick google only yielded one recent survey, and that was hardly scientific. W5ALT presented some interesting numbers, but likewise those are questionable and only represent activity observed, not necessarily the preferred operating mode of (non-actively-transmitting) hams.

Falling back to 97.1, while CW facilitates an amateur to meet all those goals, so does every other operating mode.

> Seems to me that the rational compromise would be to offer a variety of > skills tests.

Perhaps. Unfortunately, a skills test requires a greater effort on the part of VEs to implement, test, and grade. It is highly unlikely we would ever see ANY suggestion that makes testing "harder" ever implemented by the FCC. Fact is, it is politically incorrect to "fail" people. We will never see the return of a skills test to the ARS. That's the sad reality of the situation.

> For example, imagine a simple test of voice operating skill where a > person being tested has to send a message in standard form and receive

I'd almost like to see a form of Elmering system, where as a new ham your first few contacts are handled under the watchful eye of an older, more experienced ham, who can show you the "ropes". Naturally, we can do this today without any rules changes on the part of the FCC.

> I would say 25 years.

I believe you've been licensed longer than I. My introduction to amateur radio really didn't occur until 1982. I wouldn't argue your point. In the past with the "private" question pools and examination guides, certainly testing became "easier" when the pools went public (before my time). My own observations since becoming licensed in the early 90's is the testing infrastructure has been continuously weakened.

Unfortunately true. The problem the ARS will face now is people will point at the dropping number of hams as a reason why we have to "fix" the licensing/testing system by dumbing it down even further.

No? Didn't think so. Just pulling facts out of yer arse (along with other unmentionable vibrating objects, no doubt)

At no time in any correspondence addressed to me by the FCC was I ever charged -- or even accused for that matter -- of violating any section of Part 97, or any federal statute, for that matter.

Oh, I'm sure if there was a violation of Part 97, or any other federal statute, that Riley wouldn't have had any problem indicating such in his correspondence to me.

Unfortunately for you, reality is otherwise, Morkie.

According to Urban Myth, the US amateur radio test SHOULD be equal to a PhD dissertation! Or possibly for a Nobel Prize!

Ooops, the Nobel is NOT a contest and one CANNOT take any "test" to win such an award. :-)

>Most if not ALL who argue ANY of the above are sheer idiots.

Agreed. :-)

>Once
>again, they prove what they are, who they are, their intentions and just >what a wart on amateur radios A$$ THEY ARE ...

I disagree only in that I say they are just "warts."

>The test should simply cover what is necessary.

Sounds reasonable. However the Federal Communications Commission does the deciding. They always have. Since 1934 when an Act of Congress created them.

The VEC QPC does the dog work of making up the required minimum of questions-answers. The VEC QPC must, by regulation, be already-licensed radio amateurs. However, those same regulations say NOTHING about the VEC being
"certificated" test designers nor test proctors!

Now, none of the wannabe test-designers in here have ANY claimed "certification" in test designing nor test proctoring. Only one denizen of this Din of Inequity has any teaching credential - Cecil Moore.

Cecil ain't being some kind of "knowitall test designer" like those other knowitalls.

Strange, but NOT ONE in here has claimed any communications with the VEC QPC about license test content! They are all just blabbing to make themselves SOUND "important" and "knowledgeable."

>But again, you are NOT >going to be able to trust these individuals as they have argued morse is >necessary--and now they have been proved wrong.

That won't stop them. Their egos must be running on bunny batteries. :-)

To them it is an "endless summer" of the 1930s...when Kode was King...because there wasn't a helluva lot else in modes except AM voice.

What was the "need" to "replace anything in the test"
when code testing ended? Not a damn thing. Going back to US amateur radio regulations about license testing, the minimum number of questions in the pool is ten...but there is NO MAXIMUM. The actual question pool could have 20 or 30 or 40 or 50 times the minimum number of questions. Or a hundred or even a thousand. If there was any REAL NEED to "replace" the code test, then the QPC could get busy and generate those 20 or 30 or 40 or 50 times the minimum. Hard work that, but it could be done...and without having to change a single regulation on testing that exists today or last year or the year before that.

With a high enough question pool question minimum, the point could be reached to defeat the most eidetic of the idiot savants. The "all today just memorize the answers" is hooey anyway and with a very large pool, nobody could get away with "just memorizing everything."
That claim could be tossed in the dumpster along with that stupid "ya GOTTA test for code!" bullshit.

>They will now argue insane methods and ways to construct ridiculous >tests. Let us keep from allowing the fox to run the hen house!

The "foxes" must eat. A long time ago, elderly "foxes" decided that all MUST do as they say and they said that a morse code test was ABSOLUTELY, indesputably, important. More important that life itself, erhaps.
"Foxes" of later generations picked up on that and kept it going, almost as if it were in their genes (or perhaps jeans). The "foxes" keep wanting only cordon bleu just as they have enjoyed for decades. Now they are getting the first symptoms of helicobacter pylori and the poor spoiled "foxes" are getting indigestion. Boo-hoo.

>Isn't anyone watching these guys and keeping them out of trouble? (or,
>what kind of nut house are they running here?)

Nah, the Nurse Ratchets all think They are "foxes."
The "foxes" DEMANDED to run the hen house. They were the "only" important ones, the "knowledgeable" ones, and all the rest (who did not love, honor, and cherish morse code) were simply too mundane for their elitist clique. [a "clique-oh club" if you will, all wet, but without the effervescence]

If anyone REALLY wanted a "better test," they would MAKE TIME to whip up a Petition and submit it to the FCC and eventually get an NPRM to jabber about. They have NOT done that. All the "foxes" want to do is sit around jabbering about it, trying to appear all smart and guru-like. Little men with little else to do but put up images of their alleged expertise. Pfft.

It's both, depending on the need. I had quite a problem with ARRL's code practice CD. Once through and I had (unfortunately) memorized the CD. But not the code!!

Some people can't help that though. In the end, the difference is not all that much. Memorizing a formula and knowing where to look it up and use it is a functional equivalent. I wouldn't be caught dead without my ARRL handbook.

My application of the word dumb is in reference to doing it the hard way instead of the way one should.

I don't disagree with you there. I'm all about technical acumen. I just don't think all hams need to be as technically clever as I am, as some hams do.

Disclaimer: I am pretty competent in matters of computers, digital electronics, audio equipment, and their applications to video work. I'm a bit lacking in RF, which is one of the reasons that I became a Ham.

It couldn't, for the many things that we can engage in with this hobby. I doubt we would get many people into the hobby if we had to test to proficiency in all the aspects of it.

What you speak of would almost require a large structured apprentice program.

Leadership? Where? I had scout masters who looked like John Wayne when these guys attempt to stand in, even, their (the scout masters) shadows. Fact is, boy scouts is where I built my first one tube regenerative receiver ... solder joints looked horrible--but it worked!!!

Yes, but what about those who simply word associate the answers and never bother to learn the underlying theory at all? Are they really a benefit to the ARS, other than upping the "body count".

> I don't disagree with you there. I'm all about technical acumen. I

I believe the theory examinations should be structured to test people on basic knowledge and skills -- the building blocks they use to further their journey in ham radio. I do not feel it is unreasonable to expect folks who get licensed to actually 'know' these things.

70% isn't necessarily "proficient". I would say 70% is adequate for passing the test. I would be hard pressed, for instance, to say an employee who gets 70% of their work correct is proficient at their job.

Hear, hear!

Q and A pools are here to stay, Amateur radio is no exception. The moaning and wailing, gnashing of teeth and hand wringing about the good old days -that my research convinces me weren't anyhow - is more likely just nostalgia for a time that didn't really exist.

I can understand that a little bit. Since I got my license, I've started a love affair with hollow state. I love the heat, the look and feel, even the smell of that vintage equipment.

But there is too much evidence that those good old days weren't all that good after all.

I wonder who is going to provide a better learning environment, people such as myelf - a presumably substandard product of the dumbed down newfangled system, who only passed a 5wpm code test, and the "easy" new tests, or one of the old geniuses who comes into the room with the attitude that the new ham is as likely an idiot as not?

Just a comment about this part of the thread.

Once you get away from distinct skills such as Morse code acumen, you get into a grey area. I'm trying to envision a test where one VE wants only plain english and another one thinks it is cool to say things such as QSL, QTH, or HI-HI on voice. So much subjectivity.

Operating practices are OUR responsibility to teach the new guys.
The idea of having to know it at the time of testing is not entirely realistic.

You're right. This is why I do not (currently) support any type of "skills" test. Although I am not opposed to the idea, I cannot think of a way to implement one fairly. Instead, I feel the focus should be on "strengthening" (not read: make more difficult) the theory examinations.

Agreed. I actually enjoyed taking the tests. And for some, they are harder than it is for others.

I'm pretty well convinced that the amount of testing that would be required to be an effective ham from the date of passing the test successfully would require so much effort that no one would attempt to become a ham any more.

I've become convinced since the last time that I posted here regularly that there are some hams who wouldn't mind that a bit. 8^(

Don't make too hasty judgments. It is a sin to ignore a man who

Perhaps the FCC study guides were in essay form, but certainly the little Ameco 1956 study guide I picked up at a hamfest had Q and A. It had the answers to the Q and A also. Judging from the questions asked there are two and only two possibilities:

A. Ameco was participating in fraud, in that the Q and A they offered was not applicable to the test at the time.

B. The questions that they offered were not the exact questions on an official test, but as there are only so many ways to ask the same questions, the point was moot.

Q and A are also less subjective.

The words, "good amateur practice" do not have to appear on the

It is enforceable, none-the-less.

My gawd man!!!

You have discovered a clear case of "dumbing up!"

Never-before-heard-of-case where the licensees of today are required to be more intelligent and be expected to test well under more taxing

No where in any communication from the FCC ever sent to me is the word "fraud". You keep saying "The Sky Is Red", too, maybe someday that'll come true too.

That must really go up your back-side, huh? (though from what I've read, you'd like that)

You seem awfully preoccupied with my manhood, Morkie. Pretty unhealthy too, but then, that's what got you cashiered out of the armed forces years ago too, from what I recall.

I'm sorry, I won't be providing any of those details to you, so you'll have to find another way to snap your carrot tonite.

I do not believe this is correct, although it has been quite a few years since I've taken an amateur test.

However, from what I recall, the order of questions, as well as the letter of the correct answer, can be "jumbled" on the actual examination presented to the applicant.

Mark, every extra "deserves" a dozen extra callsigns.
:-)

Every extra also "deserves" to deceive the FCC as to where their legal residence is. :-)

Every extra "deserves" to be trustee to a dozen clubs that exist only in name. :-)

Now we get the "I never did anything illegal BS."

This is like O.J. doing an "If I Did It" book. :-)

Jeffrey Herman "confessed" that Mikey D. coerced him into supplying him with a P.O. Box in Hawaii.
[his own if I remember...]

Mikey D. has never proved to anyone in here that he really was a Hawaii resident. Nor has he proved much of anything except he still has that snazzy KH6 callsign. He got away with it. Others have.
That makes it "right." :-)

Circumventing the law and crawling through loopholes is not exactly ethical behavior for a mighty morphin' amateur commando. It is closer to the "maturity" of four-year-old-hams of 1998.

That's nice, but you're not replying to Mark. That's his frogger (sometimes forger), Wabbit. Wabbit's very scared of Mark, because he's afraid that Mark might have legal grounds to haul him into court (either civil or criminal) and make him pay big-time. Wabbit, however, is also a major-league closet-case and homophobe (as well as biphobe), and compulsively harasses Mark for being an out bisexual (long story behind that, involving Steve Robeson and blackmail). Wabbit may be Woger Wiseman, long-time spankard, or may not.

Can you drive your ham rig on he streets and kill or main others by losing control?

That "license comparison" subject was done to death in here years ago. It is presuming that a hobby radio license "is the same as" vehicular operation...it is far from that.

The FCC decides. In the case of the Commercial Radiotelephone licenses (three classes merged into one General class) they were made lifetime.
NO renewals needed. Ever. [sometime around the 1980s? I'd have to look in my licenses folder elsewhere to get the exact date]

The state of the radio art is constantly changing.
While not very rapidly in US amateur radio, most of the other radio services have changed drastically.
So many changes that the COLEMs would be hard pressed to keep up, certainly so the FCC if they still had to make up the tests. Can the VEC QPC keep up with slowly-changing amateur radio technology? That's doubtful since there has been little change in the written test content for over a decade.

OK, Mark, I'll put you down as the sole exception.

But, what will happen then is mighty macho Miccolis will demand that you "prove" that by googling up the appropriate "reference!" :-)

Worse yet, all the morphin' morsemen will state "they

Damn, but that's such a wonderful sentence...I may laminate it and put it in my wallet! :-)

Geez, I don't know WHY there's some kind of "watch" on FCC 06-178. The ARRL (aka 'newsgiver' to the masses) has already stated when it will probably be published in the Federal Register, even the probably effective date. How can anyone dispute the ARRL?

It WILL happen when it happens. "Scoop" Miccolis can't change it, no matter what. He still hasn't learned to accept that Change Happens.

Len:

Can't take credit for that one, Hemingway can though:

"A Farewell to Arms", by Ernest Hemingway.

However, in that same novel:

"The coward dies a thousand deaths, the brave but one?"
"Of course. Who said it?"
"I don't know."
"He was probably a coward," she said. "He knew a great deal about cowards but nothing about the brave. The brave dies perhaps two thousand deaths if he's intelligent. He simply doesn't mention them."
"I don't know. It's hard to see inside the head of the brave."
"Yes. That's how they keep that way."

Couple of points:

- Before March 21, 1987, the General and Technician used exactly the same written test. The only difference in testing for the two licenses was that General required 13 wpm code and Technician required 5 wpm code.

- When the Conditional license existed, it too used the same written test as the General and Technician.

- The questions and answers in the Ameco Guide you have were not the actual questions used on the test. They were written by Ameco, and were derived from the essay-type study guides provided by the FCC.

- The General/Technician exams in the 1950s were not 100% multiple choice. There were a few draw-a-diagram questions and some show-your-work calculation questions.
But the majority of the questions on those exams were multiple choice, and the Ameco folks may have thought their Guide to be adequate.

--

It is interesting that the Ameco book doesn't cover the Extra exam. In those days (1956), the Advanced was closed to new issues, but folks who held an Advanced could continue to renew and modify as needed. A few hams made the jump from General to Extra, but only a few went for Extra in those years because it gave no additional operating privileges, and the Extra required another trip to an FCC examiner. The Conditional was the by-mail equivalent of the General back then, and if you lived more than 75 miles from an FCC exam

point you could get a Conditional. But there was no by-mail option for the Extra. Conditionals made up a sizable percentage of US amateur radio in the 1950s. One source I saw said Conditionals accounted for about 25% of 1950s US hams. In that same period Extras were only about 2%.

Multiple items from FCC in today's Federal Register (Vol 72, Number 15).

The very first item in the FCC's listing is the Report and Order that eliminates all Morse Code testing from the requirements for an FCC-issued Amateur Radio license.

This change will take effect in 30 days.

I wasn't being serious Len. I didn't read here years ago and would be surprised if someone seriously suggested periodic retesting. In my stated, they don't require a written test to renew drivers licenses unless the person has been convicted of a moving violation since the last renewal.

I heard that the reason the FCC was so protective of those exams is that they only had two different versions of them. Any truth to that?

As I remember, Conditionals who moved closer than 75 miles to an FCC office were supposed to retake the General. I never did that and, if I remember correctly, I was later grandfathered to General - can't remember exactly when.

Tsk, tsk, "Scoop" Miccolis, that's WRONG.

The FCC didn't make that "list," that was just how it got arranged in the Federal Register for 24 January 2007.

It has already been stated, by the FCC, and
that omnipotent uber "authority," the ARRL,
that the FCC HAD ALREADY MADE THE DECISION and publicly stated on 15 December 2006.

> This change will take effect in 30 days.

The EFFECTIVE DATE was STATED EXACTLY
in the Federal Register, not some "takes effect
in 30 days."

Now quit playing amateur journalist and "reporter."
You do NOT have the resources, ability, nor
"inside information" of OTHER SOURCES who are bigger than you, better than you, and have a better set of cojones.

And don't give us this bullshit about "just 'helping'
others in getting the news out." There are plenty of other sources, all publicly available and free.

Yas. But to get most morse mavens above the SIMPLE algebra of Ohm's Law is most futile. [to many that is "rocket science."

Well, the kind of "rocket science" exemplified by that long-defunct TV series "Buzz Corey." I.e., comic-book stuff.

Nooo..."they" won't see it because their blindfolds are still ON.
What they "see" is what they are TOLD to see by that printing house somewhat close to Hartford, CT.

BTW, the "Borg Queen" is now US Army and making out with Agent Gibbs. :-)

The bush league has made page 1 and KTLA got its special star on the Hollywood Walk of Fame on its 50th anniversary of existance.
"Scooter" Libby's trial has begun (bush league getting back pages as an encore). All sorts of "news" this 24th day of January 2007.

Er, not quite, John. For years the ARRL has been losing members.
They don't make a big fuss over that and one can't tell without going to QST's "sworn statement" (of circulation) that they publish twice a year. Their MAJOR income HAS to be from the publishing side of that triad. Three or four years ago it had an IRS reported income
of $12.5 million. [not bad for a "non-profit" organization] There was,
may still be, a website that publishes the IRS income statements of the ARRL.

Just the same, the Believers, the Acolytes at the Alter of Maxim (note "alter" not 'altar') shall Raise The Hue and Cry! for the heads of all who DARE negatively criticize the god-given glory of the ARRL.
That may start a whole new juicy thread of Flame War as the fedayin of the morse mavens rise up from the ashes of their coded glory, sort of like a "Feenix" that was once the home town of one Hashafisti Scratchi.

Hi! I'm not Ying Guo, but I am the one referred to by "the ying collective". Do you like my pet dancing monkey? I'm training him to do all sorts of things, though he's unfortunately quite retarded. His original nym was "PorchMonkey4Life", but he developed the delusion that I forged him (and still holds it), and is now under the impression that I am also "SameAsB4" (the actual yingfish), as well as quite a few other people. He also has the delusion that he's "exposing" my other nyms (the ones with "COOSN-029-06-71069" in the sig or header info, for example, or all the "others").

Basically, he's a trolled, spanked, and owned k00k.

Oh, you weren't, but that's why I decided to inform you.;-{P}

For future reference, Mark's posting addies have either <kb9rqz> as their domain, or he's <konstanz@hotmail.com> -- except when Wabbit's committing outright forgery, it's generally easy to tell them apart, once you know that. Even then, Wabbit's obsessed with Mark's bisexuality and the delusion that Mark's wife is either transsexual or a transvestite, as well as Mark's own k00ky claims of the past. Also, of course, Wabbit exaggerates Mark's dyslexia in a very lame attempt to make him seem k00kier than he really is.

i never thought about miss roger wisman as being a kook, rather a natural born spankard. born to be spanked and proud of it. it does indeed take all types.

Speaking of wasted college education, I see Lennie still has to fall back on profanity in order to express himself.

As if we were surprised at how little his weak mind could produce.

The only "domination" here, Lennie, has been the emotional truama you suffered at some point in your meaningless life at the hands of some Amateur. Now you've found a way to lash out at all of those you deem to be responsible for your inadequacies in life.

The TRUTH of the matter is that, code test or not, we're here, you're not. I was ON the air last night...Not just wimpering about how it's someone else's fault for NOT being on the air, like you.

YOU have been the one whining and gnashing his teeth for decades, Lennie, and now that your perceived nemesis is gone, I no more expect to see Lennie H in the FCC database than I expect to find Britney Spears at my front door.

I think it is something that takes C cell batteries and vibrates.

Definitely. But the idea to me is that a Ham who scored 70 percent on the test can still put up an antenna - maybe even correctly, operate a radio, help out in an emergency, and certainly in some cases do some fine CW work.

I just think that trying to decide on what exactly makes a "good test" is so subjective. I wouldn't want to base it on what I know. I definitely wouldn't want to base it on "genius Hams" level of knowledge. Others will differ.

I would offer this though. From what I know of EE students, at least in my environment, is that they are loaded up with classes. They can't take any of the gut courses. Getting through their courses is a challenge that a fair number take an extra year to do it.

Most of them who are not Hams already, graduate with just about the same ability to put a station together as a newly minted General. Who had a test from a public question pool.

Wouldn't it be cool to have (whenever possible) a small station set up at exams? Even a FT817 and a miracle whip antenna. Get the successful testees the chance to get their first QSO as a new Ham. Start the Elmering process right away. At that point the plain speech ham can give their opinion on how to talk, and the HIHI ham can do the same, without affecting the test process.

Excuses, excuses, excuses.

YOU have alleged to be able to walk into ANY VE session with a minutes notice and be able to pass an Amateur exam.

No doubt there was a "spare" 60 minutes you could have afforded on the way to the Nursing Home or going to the hardware store to stop by the club meeting and take the test in those seven years.

You haven't.

You can't.

Len, is there something defective in your mental

There seems to be, because you don't call me
by my name or callsign, even though it is clear that my name is Jim, and my FCC-issued callsign is N2EY. In amateur-radio-related activities, it is customary to refer to others by their callsigns or
first names.

You have this problem with several others in this newsgroup. Perhaps you should see a psychologist and/or a speech and language pathologist about this problem you have.

> that's WRONG.

No, it is correct. Look at the Federal Register for today, and scroll down to the Federal Communications Commission listing. The Report and Order is the first item.

You can view it in text or PDF, too.

>   The FCC didn't make that "list," that was >   just how it got arranged in the Federal

You are mistaken, Len.

Under the FCC's listing in today's Federal Register,
the Report and Order is the first item.

>   It has already been stated, by the FCC, and
>   that omnipotent uber "authority," the ARRL,

>   that the FCC HAD ALREADY MADE THE

Irrelevant. The Report and Order does not take effect until after it is published in the Federal Register. That's what happened today, and it's what this thread is about.

> > This change will take effect in 30 days.

> The EFFECTIVE DATE was STATED EXACTLY
>   in the Federal Register, not some "takes effect

The effective date is exactly 30 days from January 24, 2007. That date is February 23, 2007.

So my math and my statement are correct.

>   Now quit playing amateur journalist and "reporter."

IOW, you are telling me to shut up. You don't have the right to attempt to silence someone for telling the truth, Len.

>   You do NOT have the resources, ability, nor
>   "inside information" of OTHER SOURCES who are

I don't claim any "inside sources", Len.

Who are these alleged "OTHER SOURCES who are bigger than you, better than you, and have a better set of cojones"?

I suppose you mean the folks who run the ARRL website,
because they correctly predicted that the Report and Order would appear in today's Federal Register, and that the effective date would be February 23, 2007.

>   And don't give us this bullshit about "just 'helping'
>   others in getting the news out."

When did I write that?

> There are plenty
>   of other sources, all publicly available and free.

What's your problem with my posting the information
here, Len?

None of that information is incorrect. I posted direct links to the Federal Register so people could see for themselves.

What's wrong with any of that?

You seem to have a problem with others' exercise of their right of free speech. Why is that? Are you afraid of what they might say?

Perhaps you are simply angry that the folks at ARRL Hq. correctly predicted the dates associated with this Report and Order.

Perhaps you are angry that I found out about the Report and Order before you did, and was the first to post the news here on rrap.

Or perhaps you are depressed, and expressing it as anger, because now you will not have anything to post to rrap about.

I suggest that you should examine your behavior here,
and consider how you could behave in a more mature and civil manner.

Here's a start:

My name is Jim and my FCC-issued callsign is N2EY.
Try using one or the other, or both, when you refer to me.
Like this:

"Jim, I disagree with you about that"

or

"I disagree with N2EY on this"

or

"Jim/N2EY has stated that...."

See how simple and easy that is? You can do it - just try.

Jim, N2EY

Gotta explain that last for all you young squirts of fiftysomething or less...

One of the independent ham magazines, may have been CQ, used to carry a column in the back of each issue around 1950 to 1960 time, written in pseudo Japanese-American dialect by one "Hashafisti Scratchi" who "lived in Feenix, AZ." Always the same small art work portraying "Hashafisti" as a grinning boob in front of his radio set.

I used to think it amusing before I enlisted in the US Army and spent three duty years in Japan. Afterwards, I didn't think it so funny and, at times, appeared racially biased. Some of the points the real author was trying to make got lost in the improper pseudo-Japanese-American "language."

Looking back at that period, and for a couple decades following, that sort of racial bias pervaded American amateur radio periodicals. The hobby was mainly MALE and WHITE with only a scant few exceptions. That can be seen in thousands of photos of hams there were depicted in all of those periodicals...male and white. Clear evidence that, untouchable being preserved on real paper with real ink (unlike the ephemeral computer "records").

Such rather obvious gender and racial bias continues in US ham radio publications today. It's obvious that some of the more vocal of the hammus americanus breed in newsgroups keep on with it and adding the idocy of "morally proper" sexual practices...indeed expanding that to "morally proper" any-kind-of-practice nonsense.

If the remaining publishers manage to squeeze out enough ad revenue to survive into the future, they had damn well ought to LEARN to be more liberal when it comes to readers and subscribers. This old bullshit of always pandering to the OLD and overly-venerating long-ago times is going to be their ending.
Firstly, those that love the olde-tyme pandering will decrease
due to simple facts of actuarial tables. Secondly, the advertisers, those who REALLY pay for each issue's production, are going to find BETTER venues to spend their advertising money; they are the ones producing and making the cutting-edge-of-technology radio systems, not a bunch of nostalgia buffs longing for the days of their long-vanished youth.

Only PART of your lead-off posting was tongue-in-cheek. The reality is that the number of US amateur radio specialty magazines has been continually shrinking despite an expansion not long after the end of WW2. CQ was - apparently - the first of the post-war independent magazines, followed (or preceded, irrelevant) 73. Both enjoyed a growth period of a couple decades. Ham Radio was a late-comer but that technically-oriented independent publication managed to make a profit for 22 years. HR had to fold for only one reason: lack of attracting ad space. 73 quit later for the same reason. CQ started, and then dropped CQ VHF. Same reason, not enough ad revenue for the publisher to make a profit. QST has hung in there for only ONE reason: it is the membership magazine of ARRL members and can point to all its members as being the magazine's demographic base. However, ARRL membership is slowly decreasing, not increasing and the League hasn't taken much effort in attracting HALF of all US amateur radio licensees...the Technician class. The Tech class has always been growing since the original no-code-test class was created in 1991...so much so that it became de facto the "entry level" class, far surpassing the constantly-decreasing Novice class (the supposed entry-level).

A lot of US radio amateurs think mistakenly that their subscription fee "pays for all the magazine content." NO WAY. Subscription fees go instead to what the periodical industry calls "fulfillment," the costs involved in mailing, maintaining subscriber lists, reminders of subscription termination coming up, and the grunt work of putting real ink on real paper, then sending it out en masse to distributors. The income publishers get goes to the magazine staff (the paid workers), maintaining their offices and equipment, compensation for authors, and all the assorted little costs of staying in business. Author compensation in the hobby activity area is minimal, even if the author gives up all "first rights" and subsequent rights for reproduction.

To explain more, "first rights" by a publisher is fairly standard; they get the (copy) right to publish a work first. Usually that also involves the right to reprint it as many times as they want in the future. Normally, an author can get sale rights such that they can LATER publish it with anyone the author cares to go to (and be accepted by another publisher). The good publishers usually compensate authors when reprinting material later, giving them (a small pittance) some monies for that reprinting. The ARRL is NOT anywhere close to being that generous...not only do they demand first-rights but they keep all subsequent repro rights in anything they press out. To add to that is that they seldom, if ever, give the author credit for a reprinted work and if reprinted, just say it appeared in a previous edition. Anyone selling to ARRL will NOT make any monetary profit and such work is solely for the author's emotional sustenance.

What appears to readers is that "the ARRL did all that marvelous radio gear and instruments seen in Handbooks (all by itself)" but hundreds and hundreds of individual authors did. There's some sign that the League is relaxing those "rights" for compensation, but not enough. Yes, they can do whatever they want to, perfectly legal of them to do so. But, the other side of the ARRL house is supposed to be the all-seeing, all-knowing, "we KNOW what is best for [US} amateur radio" membership organization. There's a deep dichotomy there, border-line hypocrisy on (elusive) SPIRIT.

With the (final) legalization of FCC 06-178, the League might wise up, see some light, and do some CHANGE of its attitudes. I am very pessimistic on that but miracles have happened. The League must change to fit the times. They can't run around fat and happy on nostalgia of the prioneering days of the 1930s with "spark-gap experiments" featured as the Latest, Greatest State of the Art re-creation. The Great Battle Re-Enactors do it for fun and can't possibly change history of who won and who lost. Neither can the ARRL hold back the dawn and refuse to recognize that over half of US radio amateurs just don't give a shit for morse code...and the US government agrees.

Shove it up yer bum, Sister. YOU have the problem of looking down yer snoot at NCTAs and those without ham licenses. QUIT trying to act like some stern headmistress with the "that's wrong" and "it

arrogant oh-so-superior mother of all.

This is NOT a place where ARRL meetings are

If YOU get criticized, then you get criticized.
LEARN to accept it. YOU are NOT supreme authoritiy on anydamnthing...quit acting as if you were.

You going to run my "profile" again? :-) You do NOT have either the qualifications in psychology
nor do you have the cojonnes to take it in here.
Not for years. The only time you get "friendly" with anyone is if they agree with YOU. The rest of the time you get all pompous, prissy, pedantic, manufacturing "errors" which were not there, trying to FIND FAULT with opponents in a perverse way
by nit-picky prissiness of "spelling" or "phrasing"
or outright DEMANDING RESPECT by using (your)

Sweetums, you got a PROFILE that is MUCH larger than mine and most of it shows an ordinary bigotted sociopathic behavior. That's based on primary psychology 101 and 102 plus a lot of years
having to associate with assholes in real life.

Now I will give you a small gram or two of margin.
You LOST the NPRM that led to FCC 06-178 and your over-strident non-case for keeping the code granma.

Now you get busy on your Time Machine project.
Since you are always so damn superior, you can send yourself back to a kinder, gentler time when Kode was King and you have a chance to ascend

That link points you to today's notices, which changes from day to day.

Anyway, see http://www.arrl.org/news/stories/2007/01/24/100/?nc=1

Feb 23 is when civilization as we know it will end... :-)

John, you are positively profound on your prophecies! A bow to you in honor of that gift.

Sister Nun of the Above went in "spanky" mode today doing just what you described. Truly amazing. And predictable. :-)

I gotta give your prophecies a lot more respect!

Humbly bowing,

LA

"But now the end is near. Now Mark Foley comes along and is making almost all liberal dreams come true and seriously, I'm sorry for it. See, I believe in karma. I believe what comes around goes around and I know full well that it's just bad juju to wish such a level of turmoil and ill upon other humans, warmongering gay-hating maladroits or no, and that the real path of enlightenment is paved with forgiveness and progress and white-hot love and turning the other cheek and scotch.

"In fact, Jesus said something about that, I do believe. He said, "Knock it off already with the warmongering and the hating of each other and let's all get some wine and party like it's 2012." Then again, he never saw Karl Rove stab the nation with the dull ice pick of bogus fear. He never heard George W. Bush describe brutal war and the death of tens of thousands as "just a comma" in world history.

"Check that. Maybe I'm not so sorry after all." -- Mark Morford,

I don't understand why Jim bothers treating you with civility, Leonard. Time and time again, you've displayed characteristics which cross the boundaries of civil behavior.

A licensed radio amateur who has never taken a Morse Code test is still a radio amateur. To my knowledge, the only person posting to this newsgroup on a regular basis without an amateur radio license is Leonard H. Anderson. Oh, we have the occasional CBer and peyote-puffing "John Smith", who seems not to be able to tell amateur radio from the Citizens

Band, but it is basically you, Len.

You don't give orders here, old soldier.

> This is NOT a place where ARRL meetings are

> is a newsgroup.

ARRL meetings? If we had paid attention to you, we'd believe that this is a chat room. You're right about one thing: This is a newsgroup and it deals with amateur radio. You aren't a radio amateur but you've blown smoke here for better than a decade. Perhaps you could have learned something about amateur radio in that period but it appears that your transmitter is always keyed and that your receiver never has a chance to do it's thing.

> If you can't take it, LEAVE.

You give no orders here, Leonard. Besides, according to you, your time here is nearly at an end.

> If YOU get criticized, then you get criticized.
> LEARN to accept it.

You've never LEARNED to accept criticism, Len. Why is it that you can't follow your own advice? You've worked yourself into a froth this past week, braying and howling like a man possessed.

> YOU are NOT supreme > authoritiy on anydamnthing...quit acting as if you > were.

Why can't you take your own advice, Len? You are certainly not knowledgeable about amateur radio, but you attempt to hold court like you've been involved for decades.

> You going to run my "profile" again? :-)

If he doesn't, I'll be happy to. It fits you to a tee.

> You do
> NOT have either the qualifications in psychology

I think he does, Len. He has stood up to your unpleasant nonsense for a long, long time without resorting to your tactics. What is your sudden fixation on bollocks?

> Not for years.

Not for years, what? That wasn't really a sentence, was it?

The only errors I've noted Jim pointing out were errors which were actually there. You made quite a number of those errors. They weren't alleged errors or throwaway errors. They were actual mistakes or deliberate misrepresentations.

> Sweetums, you got a PROFILE that is MUCH
> larger than mine and most of it shows an ordinary

"Bigoted", Len.

Your own profile is quite accurate. It needn't be large, only accurate. You wouldn't know bigoted sociopathic behavior if you saw it. You see it frequently because it comes from your keyboard. It is the behavior which causes you to make up the insulting names for folks. It can be seen in your snide and insulting comments directed to radio amateurs in general, to those who supported the retention of Morse Code testing and to the American Radio Relay League.

> That's based on

If you're last in line, the world must look to you like it is filled with them.

The last barrier, the f i v e w o r d p e r m i n u t e
Morse Code test will be gone in a month. The last obstacle in the path of your opening the box containing that Extra Class amateur radio license is about to be removed. There's nothing in your way, save for inertia.

"When I told Abbie Hoffman that he was the first one who made me laugh since Lenny Bruce died, Hoffman said, "Really? He was my god." The combination of satirical irreverence and sense of justice that Bruce and Hoffman shared was the real spirit behind the Yippies--a term I coined to describe a phenomenon that already existed: an organic coalition of stoned hippies and political activists who engaged in such actions as throwing money on the floor of the New York Stock Exchange, then explaining to reporters the meaning of that symbolism. Folksinger Phil Ochs summed it up: "A demonstration should turn you on, not turn you off." So when journalists link the Yippies with misleading bedfellows, at best it's careless shorthand; at worst it's deliberate demonization. Osama bin Laden wanted an aircraft to crash into the Pentagon. Abbie Hoffman merely wanted to levitate it." -- Paul Krassner, http://tinyurl.com/ehu3v

Worse than that! Can't really tell FM Broadcast, AM Broadcast, CB, Civil Service, TV, etc. from amateur radio--all just looks like rf to me!

However, I can tell SOME hams from normal people--seems it has to do with the size of their egos and heads. A mistake they make which causes sane people to ask, "What separates these "weird amateurs" from those in the mental asylums--both seem to be suffering from illusions of grandeur?

My apologies to you, Bob. Sometimes it is hard to discern who is serious or who is wry in this Din of Inequity. [as in ham-on-wry... :-)]

>In my >state, they don't require a written test to renew drivers licenses >unless the person has been convicted of a moving violation since the >last renewal.

That's pretty much the case in my state, California...but somewhat graded. Every five years it was into a DMV office to take a real shortie of a written test, check appropriate physical things (corrective eyeware required in my case), do the fingerprint thing, photos, etc. No actual vehicle driving test. After ten years I was called to take the full written. Went to the California state

DMV website and brushed up on new laws. Passed the written and again, NO actual vehicle driving test. [I had then been driving every day of those ten years...how did they think I GOT to the DMV office? :-)] No, none, zip, nada moving or stationary violations in ten years.

But, <seriously speaking, voice in hushed tone> a radio hobby test isn't even close to a requirement to operate a vehicle that can KILL others as a result of a minor lapse of attention. The California DMV driver test (full-on version) is multiple-choice. The number of questions? I forgot, but the latest info can be obtained on the 'net. The nature of operating a heavy vehicle mandates at least a cursory check of basic physical abilities by officials whose main task is public safety.

There's NO such need in amateur radio, nor has it been so for commercial radio licenses for as long as I've been licensed there (51 years). PERHAPS a periodic review of new radio regulations? Sort of like what I call the "shortie" test at the CA DMV. That might be applicable for the single-Part amateur regs in the USA, but the commercial radio licenses cover operating in MANY different radio services covered by as many Parts in Title 47. Plus, some radio services don't need all radio operating personnel to have any form of license.

SOME form of licensing is needed for a station, especially one that can spritz out RF energy all over the globe, ionosphere permitting. For safety reasons? I don't think so. Amateurs aren't allowed microwave-cooking kinds of powers or have they the kilowatts needed to heat-cure plywood laminations in 32 sq. ft. sheets. Radio amateurs can kill themselves doing dumb NON-amateur things, so there isn't a need for yet-another governmental watchdog on that. I'd say the jury is still out on "RF exposure" at HF even though it is codified in law (and has questions on the test)...at least at amateur allowed RF powers. For technical reasons? Yes, the activity IS technological. For regulatory reasons, absolutely. Part 97 alone is many many changes in the last 10 years; I can see that in bound volumes from the GPO on Title 47 versus today's regs available at the GPO website.

But, bottom line, the FCC is still the final decider. They grant the licenses, try to enforce the written (and spirit) law, can fine miscreants, and yank back the licenses of offenders.

Deignan got away with it because there was NO SPECIFIC

FCC did not flag it down for those doing the club call who had over 30 "club" calls. :-)

Deignan's actions violated the SPIRIT OF THE LAW. I'm no differ on the kind of court but that is a trivial matter.

It is still prosecuteable.

Any class having Vanity Call privileges could have done

Problem is, MOST licensed amateurs are content with just
ONE license or they might be a trustee of ONE club license.
They exist and the club is probably a real club with membership rolls and all that.

When ONE licensed amateur is trustee of MANY clubs, the FCC can (and has) rightfully questioned whether or not those clubs existed by asking for membership, meeting locations, etc. If those weren't supplied, the FCC can logically consider the "club" non-existant and yank the license. Usually they do a letter request for the pertinent information first, giving an "easy out." The hoarding individual can then request the FCC to drop the "club" call in lieu of supplying bogus "club" info.
Least fuss for all that way. However, the STIGMA remains, onus on the hoarder. Forever. <shrug>

My read on the Cranky Spanky is twofold: The guy is a control freak trying to get a "rep" as all-seeing, all-knowing guru; he is trying to button-push certain others so that they get "wound up" and say real nasty things that would allow him to go crying to Google for help to have the nasties banned forever and ever. :-)

Both of those items above would accomplish what he seeks,
RECOGNITION. A side benefit would be "respect."

Yanno, there is some "respect" for someone who works SO DOGGEDLY at the "correction" game. Before work, after work, almost any time free. It's like he got NO other thing in mind. :-) Obsessive-compulsive disorder. He got, not me. :-)

Some of these poor dummshits never did the BBS thing in a large urban area before Internet. They've missed a HEAP of such compulsive-obsessive disordered minds on the loose, frazzling the nerves of sysops all over. Was easy to "moderate" them by just Locking Them Out. :-) I've seen ten kinds of examples of control-freaks, button-pushers, disordered minds for every one who has ever been in here. They don't know that they've been replied-to (sometimes) with the SAME thing they do to others!

Utterly fascinating to see both. :-)

All the best,
LA

Hello Cecil,

I don't know if there were only two exams in those days. I do know that there were not a lot of different exam versions then - I've seen reports of there being only three, and others that the number never exceeded five

In any event, there were so few that if a person kept going back to FCC and retook the written exam, pretty soon they'd have to come across the exact same exam they'd taken before.

As I understand it, the limited number of different written exams was also one reason for the 30-day-wait-before-retesting rule.

What happened was this:

Prior to about 1953, all amateur exams were conducted by FCC unless someone lived more than 125 miles "air-line" from an FCC exam point, or was a shut-in. This included Novices and Technicians. Also, if a ham who obtained a license "by-mail" moved to less than 125 miles from an FCC exam point, they had 90 days to retest or forfeit their license.

On top of all that, the Extra/Advanced/Class A exams were not routinely available by mail, and if a ham with a by-mail license wanted one of those licenses, they not only had to travel to FCC, they also had to retake the General exams first.

The reason the license was called "Conditional" was that it was issued conditionally, in FCC's view, and when the conditions changed you had to retest.

Most of those rules changed about 1953-54:

Novice and Technician became by-mail licenses regardless of distance.

The "Conditional distance was reduced from 125 miles to 75 miles "air-line"

The requirement to retest if you moved closer was eliminated.

And in February 1953, Conditionals and Generals got the same operating privileges as Advanceds and Extras.

That state of affairs lasted a decade or so, until 1964-65. Then FCC changed the "Conditional distance" from 75 miles to 175 miles, and increased the number of exam points. These changes greatly reduced the places where a person in CONUS could qualify for a new Conditional license because of distance.

Those 1964-65 changes to the Conditional were one reason for some of the opposition to the "incentive licensing" changes that came later in the 1960s.

Finally in the mid-1970s the FCC phased out the Conditional completely. They simply stopped offering it, and began renewing all Conditionals as Generals. This was in the era when FCC not only had many scheduled exams, but would also send out traveling examiners upon request if a minimum number of examinees could be guaranteed. Ham exam sessions were being conducted by FCC at hamfests, conventions, and club meetings, and the perceived need for the Conditional disappeared.

Your recollections are correct, Cecil, with minor corrections to the Conditional distance. Which changed right around the time you got the license, as did the retest rules.

Maybe... maybe not. We accept 70% as an arbitrary # that someone 'knows' the material.

However, as currently structured, that 70% passing grade is "all encompassing" on the examination. You could miss every single question on the antenna theory subelement (or regulations subelement, or some other topic) and still pass the exam and get your ham license.

I proposed in my 1998 NPRM comments that applicants be required to get 70% or better on each subelement. Thus, you would have to "pass" the subelement on regulations, "pass" the sub-element on antenna theory, etc.

Neither would I. I think the current testing system is okay, with minor modications to help ensure applicants actually know the material. In no way do I want to increase the "difficulty" of the exam (although no doubt some will claim my ideas would make it more difficult for someone to get a license, although I counter that someone knowing the material would, in fact, have no difficulty).

groups have ceased being active therein.

Prior to the deterioration of rec.radio.amateur.misc and rec.radio.amateur.policy, both groups had active discussion of their chartered topics. It is expected that offering a moderated group will persuade those who formerly participated to resume their participation in rational, focussed, and informed discussion. Proper moderation will enable serious postings to the group to remain on topic while not limiting who can voice opinions or what opinions can be voiced.

Combining the topics of the unmoderated rec.radio.amateur.misc and rec.radio.amateur.policy newsgroups into a single moderated newsgroup is offered as the most practical solution for both the moderators and the participants at this time. Followup discussion in response to the 1st RFD indicated that there was significant and strongly-held opinions in favor of either opening up the proposed newsgroup to all amateur radio topics, or changing the name to reflect a misc+policy scope only. In addition to the rec.radio.amateur.misc, and rec.radio.amateur.policy newsgroups, there has also been recent discussion about moderation in rec.radio.amateur.antenna and rec.radio.amateur.dx. As a result, pointers to this 2nd RFD will be posted to those additional newsgroups. In particular, some consensus about alternatives is being actively solicited at this time. The main alternatives are:

1. Make rec.radio.amateur.moderated an all-encompassing moderated amateur radio discussion newsgroup.

2. Keep the topics focused on misc and policy, and come up with a better name for our proposed misc+policy moderated amateur radio discussion newsgroup.

Alternative #2 then branches out to two possible outcomes:

2.a. Create additional moderated newsgroups for other topics, like .antenna and .dx, now or in the future.

2.b. No one steps forward to create additional moderated newsgroups, and the other topics continue unmoderated.

Alternative #1 does not rule out the creation of additional moderated newsgroups in the future, though there is the valid point that alternative #2 fixes the name-space problem immediately for future growth, and would not have to be revisited.

Alternative #2 requires a suitable name. The name of rec.radio.amateur.misc+policy.moderated was suggested by Kathy Morgan.

One argument in favor of alternative #1 is:

- It may not be realistic to expect that, even if strongly desired, additional moderated newsgroups for other topics are going to emerge anytime soon, or at all.

Our moderation team does not intend to moderate more than 1 or 2 discussion newsgroups. We also do not feel that, as a whole, we are deep enough experts in the somewhat advanced-level topics of antennas and dx to effectively vet appropriate articles for those topics.

In followup discussion for this 2nd RFD, we would like to try and separate mere opinions from realistic plans/intentions to add additional moderated discussion newsgroups for rec.radio.amateur.*. Alternatively, it may be the case that those newsgroups' readership may not favor such new moderated newsgroups, and either defer to ours, or retain their topic discussions in the existing unmoderated newsgroups.

CHARTER:

rec.radio.amateur.moderated is for the discussion of amateur ("ham") radio, also known as the Amateur Radio Service, as defined in Federal Communications Commission Regulations and U.S. Law (47 CFR Part 97), and in similar laws and regulations in other countries, based on international treaty. It is not limited to the rules of any one country or time period. Possible topics include past, present, and future operating practices; events; contests; past, present, and potential-future rules; power limitations; authorized frequencies; allowed modes and band plans (or other gentlemen's agreements) that govern how we are to operate; what constitutes the acceptable operation of amateur stations.

The newsgroup is intended to be international in scope, not just for amateurs in the United States. It is, however, intended as an English-language forum, by custom and practice. As with General Aviation and other internationally-scoped endeavors, the Amateur Radio Service has a strong custom of the use of English and the Latin alphabet. Discussion of amateur radio in languages other than English also occurs in many country- and region-specific hierarchies, many of which have specific amateur radio newsgroups, including:

de.* (Germany)
dk.* (Denmark)
es.* (Spain)
fr.* (France)
nl.* (Netherlands)
pl.* (Poland)
pt.* (Portugal)
relcom.* (Russia)

This newsgroup is only intended to supplement, not supersede, any other amateur radio newsgroups.

General communications law or government policy of various government agencies is also on-topic, as long as the discussion relates to amateur radio. Examples would be emergency communications, local antenna restrictions, and property deed restrictions applying to operation of amateur radio stations.

Discussion of other type of radio, such as Citizens Band, Broadcast, other Personal Radio Services, Commercial or Private Land Mobile, and Marine or Aviation services are off-topic, except when directly related to amateur radio. Similarly, discussion of methods violating applicable communication law and regulations concerning radio equipment or operations are off-topic.

The following are prohibited:

* Personal advertisements (submitters of such articles will be referred to rec.radio.swap, instead).
* Commercial advertisements and money-making schemes.
* Chain letters.
* Posts in HTML.
* EMP spam.
* Binaries, apart from PGP signatures, X-Face headers, and other ancillary article meta-data.
* Forgery of valid e-mail addresses.
* Excessive morphing/nym-shifting.

* Copyright violations. Pointers to news articles, blogs, etc. on this topic are welcome but are required to comply with fair use standards.
* Personal attacks and flames, as defined by the moderation team.
* Advertising items and/or services for sale.
* Links to "objectionable" web content, including pornographic sites, sites encouraging illegal activities, or sites deemed unacceptable by the moderation team. The moderation team will cursorily check the contents of specific links to confirm on-topic content, but acceptance for posting does not imply endorsement or approval of the entire present or future contents of that web site.
* Discussion of moderation decisions. See below for information on appealing moderator action.

MODERATION POLICY: rec.radio.amateur.moderated

A moderation robot will scan all submitted posts. Each post will be either automatically approved, rejected, or sent to the moderators for manual review. The moderator 'bot will enforce the following guidelines:

* Crossposting is generally not allowed, with the general exception of crossposts of bulletins, FAQ's, and other informational articles to rec.radio.info, rec.answers, and news.answers. Infrequent administrative crossposts may occasionally be allowed at the sole discretion of the moderator.

* Postings must be in plain text. In particular no HTML or mixed text and HTML posts will be allowed. Messages that are multipart/alternative will be automatically filtered to pass just the text/plain version to the newsgroup.

* No binary postings of any sort will be accepted. Exceptions will be made for cryptographic signatures and such.

* Messages must not have a 'Followup-To' header that points out of rec.radio.amateur.moderated (other than to "poster").

* Messages must not continue a thread that has been "closed" by the moderators.

Individual posters may be temporarily banned for consistently violating the group charter. Posters who feel that their posts have been unfairly rejected or banned, either for specific content or by a specific moderator, may appeal the decision. They may do so by contacting the Appeals Board, consisting of a rotating group of 2 or more moderators, at the Administrative Contact address below. The Board will discuss and vote on the appeal and respond within 14 days if the appeal is successful. The Board will also reply within 14 days to unsuccessful submitters of any appeal that is on-topic, reasoned, civilly stated, and is not substantially an attempt to revisit the subject matter and arguments of a previous unsuccessful appeal.

Multiple temporary bans, attempting to circumvent the ban, or abuse of the appeal system may result in a permanent ban.

PROCEDURE:

For more information on the newsgroup creation process, please see:

http://www.big-8.org/dokuwiki/doku.php?id=policies:creation

Those who wish to influence the development of this RFD and its final resolution should subscribe to news.groups.proposals and participate in the relevant threads in that newsgroup. This is both a courtesy to groups in which discussion of creating a new group is off-topic as well as the best method of making sure that one's comments or criticisms are heard.

All discussion of active proposals should be posted to news.groups.proposals. To this end, the 'Followup-To' header of this RFD has been set to this group.

If desired by the readership of closely affected groups, the discussion may be crossposted to those groups, but care must be taken to ensure that all discussion appears in news.groups.proposals as well.

We urge those who would like to read or post in the proposed newsgroup to make a comment to that effect in this thread; we ask proponents to keep a list of such positive posts with the relevant message ID (e.g., Barney Fife, <4JGdnb60fsMzHA7ZnZ2dnUVZ_rWdnZ2d@sysmatrix.net>). Such lists of positive feedback for the proposal may constitute good evidence that the group will be well-used if it is created.

DISTRIBUTION:

This document has been posted to the following newsgroups:

Like I say, I kinda like it when you disagree with me, gives me a chance to see a different perspective on things. And, logical analysis is never discouraged here ...

While he is indeed a control freak and would like to bring all others into agreement with him (wouldn't you just have hated to have been one of his children!) I think his text relates strongly to his disappointment and his unwillingness to bring himself into alignment with reality.

Like I have said in past times, a relatively few strong willed individuals have been in control and at the helm of amateur radios' destiny. Now the ship has run ground from having such ill fitting captains. It could have been much more (amateur radio), and composed of enough individuals to have been able to survive. This never happened, others constantly warned them along the way. And, they were especially warned of the danger of keeping amateur radio a "good ole' boys club" and using morse as a limiting factor in allowing new licensees.

So, mankind went on and invented the internet. Now the internet overflows the world and has become TREMENDOUSLY IMPORTANT, an example is this newsgroup right here. And, the internets' appetite is ever-increasing hungry for bandwidth--something amateur radio just has laying around.

The rest is my psychic prediction--the internet will consume amateur radios' bandwidth--end of story.

Warmest regards,
JS

Those OTs' lied, deceived and lead-astray new licensees. Worse, they brain washed 'em into the good ole boys club.

Now, they sit and watch the whole darn thing falling apart. Since the old lies and deception used to work so well in the past, they are slow to give up the old methods which no longer work. They are at a loss, they are helpless, they are attempting to re-group.

However, with the internet, like the borg, (or ohms law--I guess! <grin>) resistance if futile ...

... end of story.

It isn't difficult to see your errors or to correct them. They are manifold. You yourself attempted to come into an amateur radio newsgroup and set yourself up as, what did you call it--an all seeing-all knowing guru?--on amateur radio matters. You did this despite the fact that you aren't a licensed radio amateur, just a sidewalk superintendent, a Major Hoople. What did you seek? Was it recognition or respect? If so, I'll bet you're dreadfully disappointed.
The ultimate in an individual who seeks to control something is the guy who is not in the least involved in the endeavor which he seeks to control.

That is simply TOO MUCH to pick though for the few relevant points, statements and "facts."

Truth is, rec.radio.amateur.policy has been a hotbed of discussion focusing on the failed, and sometimes un-spoken/un-written policy's which have brought amateur radio to its' knees and present precarious position.

It is true that much of this discussion now centers around the few dangerous individuals who still spout the same old lies and deception which have brought about this pathetic condition amateur radio finds itself in. But, if these individuals attempt to continue the course of destruction which has caused these present un-spoken policies, I believe discussion about the methods and goals they are attempting to implement are VERY valid and ON TOPIC to amateur policy.

There are two kinds of "amateur policy" which have brought us here, both are valid topics to this newsgroup. You simply look as though you are attempting to aid the deception.

In the end, none of this will matter, amateur radio will become bandwidth for the internet--face reality ...

You are NOTHING BUT correct. Failed amateur policy (especially the un-spoken/un-admitted "good ole' boys club") is what is the cause of all this.

Now that the individuals responsible for the failure of amateur radio, and their "policies" are on trial, they are attempting to gain passports and escape the country!

I was making reference to the:

rec.radio.amateur."added-nobility". moderated

"passport and escape" routine.

A planned method where they escape to a "safe house" where only their ideas and plans will be recognized and accepted. (new frat house for the "good ole' boys.")

It would actually be funny if it were not so pitiful. Something akin to a child closing their eyes and placing their hands over their ears so the don't have to see and hear "the bad things."

Just a continuation of what already has been proved a complete failure ...

JS

Nuremburg II, soon to be on HDTV on your local station! :-)

Gotta love der Rezident Reichsfuhrer here...copying (in essence) what busdriver Larry tRoll usta say, "Don't let the door hit you in the ass on the way out!" :-)

Roll used to be the son-of-a-beeper starshiner in here, complete with floating Ten-Tecs to his desert island so that he could call for help via morse code. Bragged three ways from Sunday on how his "summa cum laude" grades in a Human Resources collitch coarse would "get him any (posh) job he wanted." He wound up being a bus driver! Not an "ordinary" bus driver...he fulfilled and enriched the lives of the elderly and disabled with his transit vehicle...but always wanted "women of color" to sit in the back of the bus. :-) That from a retired USAF MSgt who went his whole tour as a first-class REMF (without the sex).

"Look upon their works, ye mighty, and despair!" (paraphrase)

Maybe I'll have to put a cover on the buttons I've been pushing in here. The red-hatted monkey in the rented Waffen SS uniform (complete with "dats not funny" jackboots) is becoming visibly upset. I think he cracked his monocle.

I hope the INS agent bids them a cheery wave when they head out.

"Never discouraged?!?" You've GOT to be kidding!

In watching these floundering gods of morse blabber old League sayings back and forth, the ONLY "logical analysis" ALLOWED is that of the god-given truths from the bible of the Church of St. Hiram. All else is heretical, blasphemy. Ptui.

I will agree with that. Yassuh.

Absolutely. Had Philips "invented" their wearable LED display shirts years ago, they would have been bought up for all the olde-tyme morsemen to walk around with them, announcing they were Gods of Radio. [see latest issue of IEEE Spectrum for "winners and losers" in electrical-electronic technology with Philips (of the Netherlands) having a very rare for them loser product]

Ahem...ham radio ain't no "starting point" for any Internet. The Internet was a logical progression of humans' need to communicate, much much aided by solid-state technology and Information Theory and general computer thechnology.

Look at cellular telephony which got a head start on the Internet. Four years ago the US Census Bureau made a public statement that one in three Americans had a cell phone subscription. Little two-way radios tied into the telephone system. One in three. That's like 100 million cellphones in the USA alone. Consumer electronics stores are having a profitable ball selling the things. The electronics industry trade magazines have been featuring cellphone base station technology and components. At the same time, amateur radio "men" could only preserve their testosterone
if they tested for morse code?!?!?

> The rest is my psychic prediction--the internet will consume amateur > radios' bandwidth--end of story.

Well, I look at it a bit differently. Unless US amateur radio GROWS UP to face the new millennium, amateur radio of the "hold back the dawn" leadership will simply consume itself. It was already started.

Maybe...just maybe...FCC 06-178 can throw some water on the dying embers of what was once US amateur radio. It could rise like the Phoenix from the ashes. Maybe. At least it is COLD water that might wake a few of these olde-tymers up.
Most will not, though, mumbling through toothless gums
about the Greater Glory of Morsemanship and how it once saveed the Titanic in 1912.

The rest of mankind's quest for intercommunications goes on.
The Internet is just one facet. Self-amplifying fiber-optic cable now spans the world's oceans with Gigabit data rates, the equatorial communication satellites orbit spaces were all filled years ago, DATA rules the exchange of written words, and non-radio-civilians can roam supermarket aisles talking back home about special product prices and asking if they should get those instead of what they had on the list. GPS for civilians can almost pinpoint which aisle they are in, a system that the USN pioneered beginning three decades ago.
TV viewers are beginning to catch up with beautiful video and wonderful sound through HDTV.

While all that is happening all around, the olde-tymers are busy ordering all that the only "good" radio man is one that is expert with morse code and will "always" get an amateur radio license to "prove his worth and dedication!"

Amateur radio chiefs are still vainly holding back the dawn of new ages (plural) for all they are worth. It's like some weird Amish quasi-religious movement limiting all technology fixed in the standards and practices of the 1930s, forever worshipping the PAST.

[now watch all the Amatur Standartenfuhrers hitch up their armbands, march in with their jackboots, and try to pull off a Krystallnacht on those not loving the olde tymes... :-)] Heh. "Re-group?" Like headless chickens in a barrel. :-)

So far all the Reichsfuhrers in here have done is attempting button-pushing of individuals, emphasizing their "flaws" and "moral indecencies." :-)

The Gods of Olde-Tyme (amateur) radio not only have clay feet but clay brains. But, they claim "SUPERIORITY!" :-)

You know Len, this is really pretty much old stuff. They are working on lie detectors which actually work (can interpret human thought patterns correctly) this is only the beginning of a device which will be implantable and allow your/my brain to interface with the internet

2487. MI5 Persecution: Toronto Freenet supports free speech (824)

Newsgroup: rec.radio.amateur.policy
Date: 2007-01-25 19:43:45 UTC
From: MI5Victim@mi5.gov.uk
Message-ID: <m07002520380769@4ax.com>

Despite an orchestrated campaign of attempted censorship by UK-resident newsgroup readers, TFN did not bow to demands for a suppression of freedom of speech. TFN general policy on the matter is as follows;

Draft Policy on Account Deactivations due to News Group Postings
==========

News group postings occasionally take the form of a message which goes against the "topic" of the conference.
For example, a derogatory message about Canadians in the soc.culture.canada.

Members of such news groups then may send a message to the system administrators asking that a user's account be terminated because of such posting.

The Toronto Free-Net Board of Directors has taken the position that the only postings that will get a person's account terminated is material that is illegal under Canadian law. Otherwise, the Toronto Free-Net will not take any action.

Freenet Executive Director Mike Anderson had this to say regarding the continued attempts of a minority of usenet participants to have my account on his system deactivated;

The TFN's policy is not to take action against members unless they contravene the Criminal Code of Canada, or engage in practices such as forgery, attacks against other computer systems or mailbombing.

Mr. Corley, while possibly being very annoying, has not contravened the TFN's policies. The TFN believes strongly in freedom of expression, while recognizing that the price for such freedom may be a high signal-to-noise ratio in Usenet.

If Mr. Corley breaks the law, we will take action -- until then, he has the same rights as any TFN member to post to Usenet newsgroups. Actions such as mailbombing the TFN in protest will be met by strong complaints to the originating site's postmaster. The best defense against unwanted postings may be simply be to ignore them and deny the poster an audience.

TFN Executive Director Toronto, Ont CANADA

Personally, I find it gratifying that my contributions to usenet discussion are recognized as being conducive to a high signal-to-noise ratio by their quality and thoughtfulness.

Subject: BBC's Hidden Shame

Remember the two-way televisions in George Orwell's 1984?
The ones which watched you back? Which you could never get rid of, only the sound could be turned down?

Well the country which brought Orwell into the world has made his nightmare follow into the world after him.
Since 1990 the British have been waging war against one of their own citizens using surveillance to invade privacy and a campaign of abuse in the transmitted media in their efforts to humiliate their "victim".

And the most remarkable thing about it is that what they do is not even illegal - the UK has no laws to protect the privacy of its citizens, nor does it proscribe
harassment or abuse except in the case of racial abuse.

A lot of people in England know this to be going on,
yet so far they have maintained perfect "omerta";
not a sound, not a squeak has escaped into the English press, and for all the covert harassment absolutely nothing has come out into the public domain.

Have the British gone mad? I think we should be told.

Mmmm.

Who, exactly is this victim you're talking about?

First up, Britain or the UK (not 'England' - England is a part of Britain, like Kansas is a part of the USA) does have laws that protect the individual from harassement - you can't just threaten people willy nilly. There are laws against that. And if someone lies about you in the press or tv then you have recourse to libel/slander etc. laws.

True, Britain has no 'privacy' laws as such, but isn't that a good thing? As of this moment, the govt. are considering a privacy law, but it is unlikely to succeed. Why? Because any such law would benefit the priviledged and those in power.
Privacy laws, while supposedly protecting the individual, help those in power hide their mistakes/scandals. They stop the press etc. investigating. Privacy laws are undemocratic - they prevent the people from keeping an eye on govt.

And stop looking for some kinda conspiracy in the British press. It's hardly perfect, but your notion that they don't cover/campaign against press legislation, harrassment, discrimination, human rights etc. is plain wrong. You've never seen a British paper in yr life.

You clearly have a specific case/individual in mind. Speak up!
The thought police aren't coming round just yet.

Douglas.

Confession time - the victim is/was me (except my name isn't Corley, but that's irrelevant). What happened was not threats; just invasion of privacy, in a partiicularly flagrant and shocking way, in a way which most people would consider to constitute harassment.

You know there's a particular category of person with mental illness to whom TV and radio "talk", ie they feel the broadcast is directed at them in particular? This happpened to me, quite some time ago in the UK (I'm originally from London, so I've seen plenty of British media print and other).
They invaded my home with their bugs, they repeated what I was saying in the privacy of my home, and they laughed that it was "so funny", that I was impotent and could not even communicate what was going on. Who did this? Our friends on BBC television, our friends in ITN, last but not least our friends in Capital Radio in London and on Radio 1.

How did they do this? I'll give you an example. About a year ago,
I was listening to Chris Tarrant (Capital Radio DJ among other pursuits) on his radio morning show, when he said, talking about someone he didn't identify, "you know this bloke? he says we're trying to kill him. We should be done for attempted manslaughter" which mirrored something I had said a day or two before (I'm not paranoid, honest!). Now that got broadcast to the whole of London - if any recordings are kept of the shows then it'll be there.

You'd need to have a stack of callsigns that could be handed out to the successful test takers. Like the stack of license plates at the DMV when you register a car you just bought.

Or a control operator could let the new ham without callsign try his legs on the air, but it really wouldn't be his first real contact. He'd use the control op's callsign.

I think you wrong there buddy.

You mean the category where they think that everyone is after them ? that one ? So lets get this straight you know you are paranoid and you think that they are out to get you ? Uh huh, try putting the two together and see what you come up with.

Oh yeah, I can see it now. All of them banding together, in a united effort against one man. So ITN, the BBC, and Capital all decide to sit round the table and they come up with idea of breaking into someones house, putting bugs everywhere, listening in to his conversation, and shoving it out on the news everyday. This someone has nothing to do with politics, or business, or entertainment, just an ordinary Joe Bloggs who seems to be extremely paranoid.

Have some sense, grow up and smell reality. What you are talking about would take loads of planning, tens of thousands of pounds and lots of people involved in the planning, execution and maintenance of it. You must have a very high opinion of yourself to think you are worth it.

Of course you are not paranoid, just slightly mad. Did you ever look for the bugs in your house ? If not, why not ? I mean if I thought that was happening to me, I'd search the place from top to bottom, I mean I live there I would know if anything was out of place. If I was really paranoid, whoops I mean suspicious, I would call in one of those bug detection teams which have those machines that pick up the transmitted radio waves. This reminds me of BUGS, that new programme on BBC1 on saturdays which is all about this kind of stuff, but, shown as a drama / thriller. I suppose thats based on you as well is it ?

>is that there is a conspiracy in Britain, that it encompasses the

What a load of jolly hollyhocks, I would say something else but, apparently students are not allowed to swear on newsgroups in case it damages the reputation of the university or some such jolly hollyhocks.

This guy is extremely paranoid to suggest that the entire British media is after him in such a big way. He gives no real reason as to why they are after him, just that he suffers/suffered from a slight mental disorder, could it be paranoia perhaps ?? No surely not.

I put it to the house that he has never recovered from this mental disorder, lets come out with it and call it paranoia, and thinks everyone is after him. Remember just because you aren't paranoid, doesn't mean they aren't after you.

This guy has a serious problem to suggest that the media would go to such lengths just to single out and ridicule one person. I mean apart from anything else, we (the listening masses) wouldn't be interested unless it concerned the royal family, politicians or showbiz personalities. e.g. the camillagate tapes. I would think that almost everyone, no matter how much they went on about infringements of privacy read the transcripts with interest. I really don't think that Joe Bloggs ordinary guy or paranoid nutter would have the same appeal. Well actually I dunno. :)

Paul.

That is what happens in big cities. Hell, it scared me to death when I first started working in Manchester. People keep talking to me on the streets, even if its just to say hello, and I've no idea who they are. This happens to most people, don't worry about it.

>go very far.

Exactly. All you have offered so far as proof of your harrassment by these people is:

1) Someone on radio said something that you had recently said
and
2) People on the streets seem to recognise you.

These are both perfectly normal occurences and happen to lots of people every day so it is unsurprising that people here, and the police, are not taking you seriously.

Trying to always keep an open mind about things I would say that one of three things is likely.

Either there is a lot more to this that you are not telling us, or you are messing about or you have some genuine delusions. I'd like to think that in two of the three cases you would find some real support here, but it seems unlikely I'm afraid.

The key is the pattern, or a change in the pattern. I've lived in London almost all my life, and just walking around the streets, I never got hassled by anybody. All of a sudden, people start harassing you, throwing abuse at you, behaving as if they know you personally, as if they've seen you before somewhere. I read in the papers that this happens to Colin Stagg and people like that Eastenders actress, but they've had their picture in the paperes, so that is understandable. In a couple of cases people have even known my name - when I was in London over Easter I was walking down Shaftesbury avenue in the West End when somebody (no idea who they were, just some bloke with his girlfriend) called me by name - quite clearly, and my name is distinctive. This also happened once about four 1/2 years ago, onn the tube - some blokes I had never seen started chanting my name and a term of abuse.

It's the pattern which convinces me there's something to it - and would convince any impartial abserver who could see things tyhrough my eyes.

>Doesn't this suggest to you that there are, in fact, no bugs to be found?

There's a little story behjjind this. First iof all, in 1992 I worked for a company where the people made clear they knew what was going on, first of all directly (the very first evening I was there I went out to the pub with them and the Technical Directpor said to another guy, "is this the bloke who's been on TV?" "yeah, I think so") and also indirectly, by rep[peating stuff I was saying at home in London and in my rented accomodation there (I moved several times in the course of 1992 and they followed me each time). Now, if "they" (the buggers) knew their bugs could be found easily, they wouldn;'t be keen to make their existence known, would they?

Also, in summer 1992 I went on a trip abroad to Europe by coach, and on the way out there were a couple a little younger than myself on the coach a bloke and hius girlfriend. He said things about some bloke who was never named, who sounded exactly like me - and he made explicitly clear that our house was bugged, and that a neighrbours house was bugged (and at work they'd been rep[earting what was said at the neighbours, so this looks like independent corroboration).
They also said stuff like "at school he was always really streesed, they found someone from his school and he was a real psycho"
and that "he was in a B&B for one night and they got him", dead right again, I had been in B&B for once night a few days before this trip and weatching the news again got a reaction from the newsreader.

Yeah, but this is the point. Each incident is easily and automatically deniable along the lines you're taking. But when this happens every time, and when you get independent corroboration from other people, then there's no escaping it. For example, immediately after I lost my job in 91 I went into the local garage to get some work done on the car, and one of the blokes there said to the other, "so what do you think of it then? it's getting killed on the radio isn't it"
Now again, you look at that and no proff; you can ask them what they're referring to and they can say they're talking about something else.

>I know you may be a little paranoid, but I suggest you sit down >and work out rationally what possible reason anyone off television, >or radio would have for listening to your conversations. After all >it must be hard enough to present a show to millions of people >without the added burden of watching and listening to a single >person and slipping their phrases into the programme.

These presenters are clever people. They wouldn't be presenters
if they weren't - they're easily capable of reacting to an individual in this way.

What possible reason? I guess because they think it's amusing to do so. They know that if you ever tell anybody, without being able to show any evidence, then the reaction you'll get from just about anybody will be the one you're showing now.

I realize there are loads of people in England and elsewhere with the sort of thoughts I've described in these postings; and almost all impartial observers would say that nothing other than an go after their private conversations (if they did it to me then I can do it to them, it's a questions of technical competence and money).
If you were lucky, you might be able to entrap them into admission.
You could of course harass or threaten them back (any coppers reading this?) but that would be illegal and might get a result quite different to the one you're trying to achieve. Of course, it might come out of its own accord given time - if so many people know, if they have an escape valve in their "subtext" through the media, will it not cease to be at a covert level, given time? Surely it is in my interest for it to become overt, since the transgressions at this time are on their side and not on mine?

Thoughts? There must be some way of breaking the secrecy. This isn't the first time in human history that a conspiracy has taken place on this scale, but the truth tends to out. The situation now is they think they';re "winning" hence have little stimulus to change the rules - if they started seeing themselves "losing"
things could change drastically.

Mike, if that is your name,

I'm going to try to rationalise what you're telling us. I can think of three possible explanations for what you are experiencing.

One is that there _is_ a conspiracy against you. As a previous writer said, though, a lot of these programmes are taped, so it really isn't possible in some of the cases you've named. Further, why were no bugs found in your house? Finally, unless you are a political figure or someone else in the public eye, why would anyone bother? People like me (and I assume you) are small fry; our contribution to society is likely to be minor. Why would anyone spend so much money and effort on you?

Another possibility is that you are developing some kind of paranoia. There's no stigma attached to this; we're all paranoid to some extent, although perhaps not to the extent that a doctor would call us paranoid. I think paranoia is quite a straightforward explanation here - you really do believe that all these things are aimed at you; you see people everywhere trying to get at you. Logic suggests that this cannot really be the case.

The third possibility is that not even you really believe any of this, and that this is a "troll". I'm not sure I believe this possibility, but it's possible.

Anyway, if you want to be sure that you're _not_ going mad, I'd go and see your G.P. if I were you. If you don't trust him/her, why not see someone recommended by a person you can trust? If you don't trust anyone any more, don't you think it's time you got help?

For a troll, the posts are remarkably well-informed on paranoid behaviour.. you'd need to be one, or be reasonably well-informed on the subject to sustain the tale... which lead me to my theory...ahem...:

An extension to possibility 3 (Number 3.5, perhaps?) is that the original poster may be somehting like a psychology student writing a term paper on the net community's reactions to this tale. (Now, there's paranoia for you! Not only are they listening to/watching us, they're writing reports about us too...:-)

More likely, though, is that the poster is genuinely in need of professional help (he has intimated as much, himself) and, as such, he should be encouraged to seek it.

But we've done that. I certainly have at least. Way back when you originally started posting and your posts were neither tediously repetitve nor stupidly long.

But whenever anyone makes any good suggestions you ignore them and start posting from the begining again. You don't want us to help you - so what do you want? If you really wanted help you would listen to peoples suggestions and respond to them. Is this just an attention thing?
But I'll try again, because I'm a fool like that.

You haven't yet given any examples of anything concrete to suggest that this is really happening to you. This, I would imagine, will be the stumbling block for the police. How can they possibly help you when your only evidence is a jumbled mess of TV presenters saying things that could be construed as answers to your comments and the 'feeling' that people are talking about you and watching you?

I seem to recall that last time this was being discussed someone asked if you had been to see a psychiatrist about this - after all if this is really happening then you have can only benefit from being given a clean bill of health. I don't recall an answer.

So you are no longer in the uk? And this is not happening anymore?

Then let it go. Just leave it alone and get on with your life. Its just not worth it. There is nothing you can do to prove that this happened whether it did or did not. So forget it. Go and explore the net - when people aren't spamming it with useless repetitve posts there's a lot of interesting and worthwhile things out there to see and do. Likewise real life (I'm told *&).

Once again we're running into a brick wall. The reason I started posting was because I couldn't figure out a way out of the situation, and thought that saying it out into the open would provide a catalyst for one of those "in the know" (there are plenty in this category, and it's a fair bet that some of them are reading this) to speak up.

It hasn't worked, yet. A little more aggressive shit-stirring (excuse expletive) might do the trick. Perhaps Usenet posting is the wrong arena for this sort of activity; although obviously it does have the advantage of rapid feedback.

Thing is, for people to open up, you would have to provide them with a reason why it would be in their interest to do so. There's no obvious way of doing that; to get thinking people to incriminate themselves when they're safe in denying all knowledge is not a trick I can figure out how to do.

>But whenever anyone makes any good suggestions you ignore them and start >posting from the begining again. You don't want us to help you - so what do

A "good" suggestion would be one which had the effect of halting the persecution, which so far hasn't happened. If you make a "good" suggestion then damn right I'll stop posting - because then I won't have to.

>You haven't yet given any examples of anything concrete to suggest that this

>and watching you?

Because, as said previously, concrete proof does not exist. If it existed then I wouldn't be talking to you - if it could be proved, or if those doing it could be found, they wouldn't be able to continue.

What's happened is all conversation. You can't prove conversation, not without a tape recorder, and even then you would have to prove that what they meant corresponded to what you understood.

The psychopath who manages the Applics group at my previous employers played little word games, not only with me but with at least one other person in the group; words which rhyme with swear words, words which are ambiguous, eg "bent", words which rhyme with wank, "sheet" rhymes with shit, end (how was your weak end? being the standard salutation on a Monday morning). Sounds childish, most people would easily tell him to fuck off; except to people with predisposition to depression and the inability to express themselves (this was before I started taking medication), that sort of nastiness is not bearable. After ten months of this I was so ill I was crying constantly, eventually I went into hospital and started on medication. Somebody else he did this to (over a year later!) got so depressed he took an overdose of pills, had to go on antidepressants and left.

And where does the "concrete proof" of this trouble exist? NOWHERE. Even if you had physical evidence, even if you had the presence of mind to record what was said, how could you prove what he actually meant by what he was saying? In some cases of harassment you can prove what was done, because it's undeniable. But when the harassment is done with any presence of mind whatsoever, it becomes difficult. In the case of the wider harassment, the people doing it obviously know what they're about - they must have done similar things to other people before in one form or another, and they know what they can get away with, they know what the police will do nothing about.

>I seem to recall that last time this was being discussed someone asked if you >had been to see a psychiatrist about this - after all if this is really

Yes. The reply was of the "neither confirm nor deny" variety. Not much else they can say, is there?

>Well how could they? Who would you sue? The country?

Hmmm, now there's a thought... :-)

>If this gets out then that will be the time to bring your claims to the Wrong way round. It won't get out unless I do something to bring that about; remember, it isn't in THEIR interest for THEIR criminality to be exposed. Yelling loudly on Usenet might nudge things along in the right direction.

>The only thing ruining your life right now is you, Mike. And the only thing >that will make your life any better now is also you. So go and make your

Ignoring them would be bliss, but it's not a winning strategy.

There are going to be more of these posts. Sorry. That's the way it is.

Well, cos it's true. I was hoping that someone "in the know" would appear and make some self-revealing comments, but that hasn't happened. Everyone's keeping quiet. What a pity.

Mine, mainly. The reason for putting that episode at the top of the posting is that they tried to kill two birds with one stone at the Beck trial - they simultaneously put words into the mouth of their invented "witness" to smear Janner, and repeated exactly, word-for-word, stuff which had been said by and about me.

That was the only occasion (the only one recognizable to me, anyway) when they went after another target at the same time.
And it's quite lucky they did that - because it could give some pointers to who they might be.

Presumably there are people still around who were involved in that trial, and know what happened. Beck might be dead, but the "witness" would still be around, as would Beck's solicitor.

Well, your guess is as good as mine. But what newspaper would send a team after someone for five years? I don't think so, somehow. Of course they could, but it wouldn't be in their commercial interest.

You'd have to look at a corporate entity which would indulge in activity of this type, and the nature of the contacts they have narrows down the search.

Janner blamed Beck for the invention. He didn't say anything about it having any other origin. Even had he suspected any other source, he could hardly have pointed the finger without some evidence.

>You say that the media is making similar allegations about you in

I've been accused of many things although that wasn't one of them.
Most of them have been yelled in my face by people on the street in London at some time or other. Bit difficult to misinterpret when that happens.

>What exact;y are they saying about you? (Respond here please. I'm

It changes with time. Every so often, they sing a new song;

I can't remember if this was mentioned in the "regular" posting, but on a few occasions they set me up with people nearby to talk about me, or more correctly, to talk about somebody who
(in their minds) "resembles" me, with actually naming me.

One such occasion was a coach trip to Europe in June 1992.
The "set up" comprised a guy talking to a vacant giggling female about "this bloke", who was never named. Apparently "they" (also never named) "found somebody from his school",
"they" "got" him at his house and at a neighbours, and at a B&B where their target was for one night.

Apart from that, yeah, from "what I hear on the radio". And from what I see on TV. (I wouldn't be doing my job as a mentally ill person properly if the TV and radio weren't talking to me, now, would I?)

This is the problem, and there doesn't seem to be any way around it.
If a clearly sane person reported this persecution, you might believe him, but probably you'd tell him to go see a doctor to "verify his sanity". If someone with the illness of which you could argue these things to be symptomatic says these things, again, you might believe him, but it would be unlikely - the easiest route is the one you are taking in the above paragraph. The only way I can convince you of what I am saying is by giving precise details of what, when, how - and for most of that stuff is based solely on memory.

To prove it would require an admission from somebody, or else hard proof in the shape of physical evidence such as tape recordings.
Of course, I don't have that.

>The idea of a "pattern", and the notion that if anyone could look

>This may be an illness and it can be managed by the use of medication.
>If it _isn't_ treated, it can lead to terrible tragic consequences.

I'm quite aware what the symptoms would be, and that the reality corresponds to those symptoms.

But if anything, that is an argument which could convince you of the truth of what I'm saying. If they deliberately set out to simulate the symptoms of schizophrenia - in other words, if they know through observation that their target is either suffering from the illness, or is on the borderline and could be pushed in with an appropriate stimulus, then they can feel safe in what they do, since once you are registered as suffering from the illness, people will assign less credibility to assertions that persecution is based in reality.

That this can happen, and people collude by silence, is absolutely horrifying. It is all the more horrifying that it can happen in a country such as Britain which has no history of repression.
Perhaps its happening in the UK is due to the arrogant assumption of moral superiority on the part of those in the media and others involved - we won the last war and we can keep harping on about German and Japanese war crimes, so we can do whatever we like and we'll be right, up to and including destroying the lives of our citizens (as long as we're not caught doing it).

Those are pretty much the sort of calculations that went through my head once I stopped to consider what it must be costing them to run this little operation.

The partial answer is, there have been periods when the intensity has been greater, and times when little has happened. In fact, for much of 1993 and the first half of 1994, very little happened. Although I don't think that was for reasons of money - if they can tap into the taxpayer they're not going to be short of resources, are they?

The more complete answer is in the enormity of what they're doing. When countries kill their own people, as a rule, they get found out and all hell breaks loose. This isn't some para shooting Irish teenagers in the back. This is something which permeates English society, which they are ALL responsible for, and which they cannot escape responsibility for.

Relative to the cost to British pride of seeing their country humiliated for the persecution of their own defenceless citizens, isn't is worth the cost of four or five people to try to bring things to a close in the manner they would wish? To the government a million or two is quite honestly nothing - if they can convince themselves of the necessity of what they're doing, money is not going to be the limiting factor.

Sure, it "leans" towards it. But please at least admit there is a POSSIBILITY of it being very real. And once you've done that, can you come up with some thoughts on methods of proof? I may be missing something in my assessment - there may be a way of proving it, in the face of non-cooperation from the "players".

Quite a few years ago now, I had an old set of stacked 6 element yagis, I believe mosley (maybe hygain?) made 'em? Once the CB craze was over, these things were just laying about gathering dust, bought it at a yard sale for a few bucks. Assembled it, modified it and mounted it 50 ft up.

My xmitter back then was a "laboratory amplifier" (1 - 1Ghz) capable of a kw out on hf. Max input was 100 mw for full output. I drove it with a wide band vfo with variable output. (basically a signal generator) Can't remember what rcvr I was using.

On a good day, sunspots, I could chat 'em up in Australia on ten ... and around here, they'll tell ya 10 meters is only local! <LOL>

Ya never know, ya just never know ... that beam is now gathering weeds and dirt behind a shed.

Your story might be cause for concern if it were not for the fact that there have never been any prohibitions on amateur radio licensing for women and minorities. There is nothing wrong with being either Caucasian or male. If I'm not mistaken, you yourself are both.

I'm sorry that you've discarded your morals, Len. I'm sticking with the "idocy" of believing in morally proper sexual practices. By the way, even deviates are not precluded from obtaining amateur radio licenses.

Pfffffft!!!!! Now THAT was funny!

I've stopped venerating those old people who feel some compelling need to tell and retell the glories of their rear echelon military days of over half a century ago. I'll pander to you no longer.

> Firstly, those that love the olde-tyme pandering will decrease

It is peculiar how those actuarial tables work, Leonard. When I was licensed, there were oodles of old timers licensed in the 1920s. There are very few of them left. Decades passed and I'm now an old timer.

If you obtain that "Extra right out of the box", the actuarial tables say that you'll never be able to achieve old timer status.

A guy who buys an HT or an FM mobile radio with a mag-mount antenna isn't going to be the guy who makes it happen for the advertisers, Len. Those aren't the folks buying the "cutting-edge-of-technology". This is simply another instance of you not knowing what you're talking about.

It is relevant, Len. 73 magazine didn't come into being until 1960. Wayne Green was a former editor of CQ. He was fired.

CQ didn't suddenly come into being after WWII. It was the old "Radio" magazine pre-war, produced on the West Coast. It was bought by Cowan Publications and moved to New York.

> Both enjoyed a growth period of a couple decades.

CQ grew for at least four decades. I have no idea what present circulation is.

That's a big problem.

Not really. It's problems were that Wayne Green grew old and increasingly irrational. He sold the magazine and then bought it back. It was too late to turn it around.

> CQ started, and then dropped

That's another of your factual errors, Len. You were right as far as you went, but you didn't go far enough. CQ VHF has been back as a quarterly publication for some time.

QST isn't "hanging in there" at all. It does quite nicely. It is full of advertising. The reason it has done well is that it is the premier amateur radio publication in this country.

The Technician Class license became the entry level license because short-sighted folks like Fred Maia pushed for the Novice Class to be done away with. The codeless Tech license never granted any HF privileges. It was a dead end ticket.

Thanks for your lesson in how the ARRL keeps QST coming.

CQ has paid pretty well over the years, better than Ham Radio and better than QST.

That isn't the case, Mr. PROFESSIONAL writer. You have to know what you are selling and you have to outline your terms. Reprint rights are generally separate though a magazine may insist on buying first rights and reprint rights.

Anyone who sells an article to the ARRL makes money from his article.

It is true that in the past, the League did not pay at all for articles.
Having one's material published in QST was deemed reward enough. Times changes and the League now pays. They probably don't pay enough to have you grace them with your material. Ah well, that's really your point, isn't it?

Not enough for whom, Len?

There must have been a point buried in there somewhere. I'm damned if I could find it. Where's the deep dichotomy? Where's the "border-line" or borderline hypocrisy?

Mark, there are NO "forces for good" nor of "evil" at work here. This newsgroup is just discussion by individuals.

There have been, as John Smith I explained, LITTLE men trying to be bigger than they are, attempting to "rule"
over others by overt denigration of their opponents.

Amateur radio is a hobby activity, has always been so, and will probably always be that way. By the physics of radio with its propagation of electromagnetic waves never obeying that of any human laws or proclamations, the emitters of those waves must be regulated. Part of that regulation is the licensing process. A license is merely an authorization by a federal government to follow the regulations set forth by said federal government.

An amateur radio license was NEVER a certificate of academic excellence, did not bestow its grant holder with "special powers" or "majesty" or anything superhuman. However, that implication has been long held by many in some kind of odd fantasy within the minds of the fantasy lovers. Most of those have been desperately looking for something, anything to "prove" (inconclusively) that they were "better" than others. However much they expostulate that, it really isn't so, not even when they possess all sorts of certificates suitable for framing. But...the largest amateur radio membership organization has constantly been promoting class distinction, competitiveness, playing on the "I am better than you" spirit of so many. Such reinforces the fantasy beliefs among the core membership who look to the self-defined "leaders" for guidance. The down-side of that is that the same organization has not accepted the half of all amateur licensees, perhaps more than half, that did not recognize the organizations' definition of itself.

Is there "fun" for all to re-create what was "fun" for long-ago self-defined masters of the airwaves? No. Is it "fun" for me to "try" communicating by radio? Hardly. I began such communicating 54 years ago (exactly so in the first week of February), first in the military, then much, much more as a civilian, over many parts of the EM spectrum than are allocated to amateurs, using modes that aren't allocated to amateurs. I say that as a matter of fact, not to prove I am "better" than any amateur. I simply did it. Mostly for getting the money for food and shelter, but sometimes just for my own amusement at the way different radio forms and protocols work. I find the technology of radio and electronics fascinating, so much so that I long ago changed my life goals and career. I became a professional FIRST, THEN thought about becoming an amateur. I've changed my mind about the latter many times. Has that been a denigratable moral-ethical offense? :-) To some of the little men in here, most assuredly! They have branded me morally deficient (to use more delicate descriptions of what they've really said). :-) I "had" to do it exactly as they "instructed" me to do it. Oddly enough, that was very close to what these "instructors" had done. Sunnuvagun! :-)

Those little men and their "charges" can be just shined off. They are not the ultimate judge, have no authority except what their internal fantasies proclaimed to themselves inside their heads. It is very difficult to "respect" such individuals (despite their mighty certificates), half-truths of "accomplishments" and general inability to get along with anyone but their own "elite" kind.

Now, in truth, there are thousands of radio amateurs having their own fun on the amateur radio bands, far far more than the bigots and control-freaks in here demanding instant respect and admiration for their (ho-hum) mighty works. I already know dozens who are licensed radio amateurs, good people in person despite being in opposition to some of my personal viewpoints about the hobby. We all have viewpoints on many things, yet that isn't a barrier to maintaining real, person-to-person friendships. The little men in here don't understand that or they do not bother with it in their quest to denigrate and defame those not of their ilk.

Matters not now. My quest in here has only been to eliminate the code test for a US radio license. That was accomplished.

What I personally do for myself now is unimportant and should not be a subject of further talk. The little men, the denigrators, the control-freaks will find new targets for their wrath and personal frustration venting. Matters not to me. They are what they've made themselves to be...smaller than before.

LA

What do you believe the term "non-profit" means, Leonard? Does it mean that an organization doesn't take in any money?

"Alter" is what you wrote and alter is what you've done. We needn't worry about your head. That isn't the end from where the rhetoric comes.

Don't worry too much about the ARRL, Len. It has gotten along from 1914-2006 without you. It can likely continue to do so.

You're welcome, Cecil. Thanks for reading.

The old Conditional was preceded by the Class C, which was essentially the same license with a different name. Early 1930s until the 1951 restructuring.

Some folks think that the 1964-65 rules Conditional changes really cut into the growth of US ham radio. After those changes, a ham who wanted a renewable license with HF privileges pretty much had to go to an FCC exam point unless s/he lived way out in the boonies. Just getting to the exam could be a major journey, depending on where you lived.

I was lucky - all I needed was decent shoes and a couple of subway tokens. Three quarters of a mile to the 69th Street Terminal, the Market-Frankford Subway-Elevated to 2nd Street, and a block south to the US Custom House.

Come to think of it - my parents drove me to the Houston
FCC office for my Novice exam so at that time the distance limit was still 125 miles. A year later, when my Novice expired, I was eligible to take the Conditional by mail because the distance limit had been reduced to 75 miles.
I have lost track of exactly when I got those licenses
but that knowledge should help to bracket the dates.
Thanks again, Jim.

I'm glad you wound it up, Len. My eyes were starting to glaze over.
Radio transmission has always been done at the speed of light.
We've fast forwarded as you've suggested. You still have no amateur radio license.

You could have skipped the boring part and just posted the sentence above. Why bury the point of your post at the very end?

Maybe it will be perfect; maybe it won't be. It won't be known until that box is opened. You have a different situation, Len. You made a boast on which you didn't follow through.

What are you now, Len--74 or so? You wasted seven years in which you

Are you an ego-inflated, ex-government employee type, Leonard? You've certainly spent a lot of your time trying to beat on all others who don't agree with you.

Ha, ha. You might have been able to obtain a license. Maybe you wouldn't have been able to do so. We'll never know.

I believe you, Len. You have me convinced.

Well, Foghorn, I don't think you could sell anyone that I don't like it that you got into military radio 50+ years back, got into commercial radio and never got into amateur radio. Next year will make forty years since I joined the military. Of course I'd already been a radio amateur for a number of years prior to that. I'd already worked in FM broadcast radio as well. I had a career as a civilian in government communications afterward. One of the big differences between us is that I acted upon my desire to become a radio amateur. You didn't.

Which orders have I issued, Major Hoople? You declared an interest in amateur radio. You made the boast of the "Extra right out of the box". You failed to follow through. Don't blame me for your failures.

It's like this, Leonid: You can't behave in a civil manner. You aren't a participant in amateur radio. You are a sidewalk superintendent. You serve no purpose, no function in amateur radio. Jim has an excellent memory for recalling your comments to the FCC and your gaffes, boasts, errors and fabrications here. You don't like that at all.

> I now regard Heil and Miccolis as in the same league

I've never been interested enough in your doings to hate you, Len.
I find you irritating and pompous in a field in which you are not a player.

This is all quite easy to understand, Leonid old boy. You get as you give. You make up insulting names. You receive insulting names. You denigrate. You receive denigration. I'm absolutely certain that your character has not been assassinated here in this newsgroup. There are enough of your posts archived to validate any insult tossed your way.

To paraphrase your owns recent words to another: You should LEARN to take it or maybe just get some of those Mexican bollocks.

This newsgroup isn't amateur radio. If it were, you couldn't participate here either.

he indeed has not yet followthrough on nor has he yet not followed trhough on the condiction to test it do not yet exist and will not

Which item do you consider a lie, Leonard? Would it be the boast about your getting the "Extra right out of the box". Are you denying that you wrote those words?

> At least
> all those that have babbled on in here about my alleged

The only time the word "promise" has cropped up, you were tap dancing and saying something about your boast not having been a promise.

The facts in question are not alleged. You actually wrote the words and made such a boast. It was foolish of you, but now you're stuck with 'em and you're eating your words.

> Especially that

You must be confusing Jim with another poster to the newsgroup.

You didn't make a throwaway line when you boasted about getting the "Extra right out of the box" any more than you used a throwaway line when you commented to the FCC about setting a minimum age limit for amateur radio licensings.

> She never got my knuckles with her spanking

You seem to be the one who is angry, Len. Are those the "message knuckles" you've written of?

Please don't attempt to gain any sympathy with the my-mother-was-dying excuse. You had time to post here and to hurl your quota of insulting remarks toward those who disagreed with you.

Don't cloud the issue and attempt to reintroduce your mother into the discussion. Your statements have not been exaggerated and they are certainly not fabrications. You made them. Own up to them!

Good God, man. You're coming apart like Captain Queeg!

"Could have" and "did" are quite different. You might have done it, but it isn't likely. The fact is, you never tried.

Yep, that would have been the reason. It was the only way to obtain an HF amateur radio license. You let the very thought of that f i v e w o r d p e r m i n u t e code test keep you from acting.

Why? To use the "Extra right out of the box" on the amateur bands.

That's class "Fox and the Grapes" reasoning, Leonard.

You're confusing amateur radio with something you've done to earn a

It's kind of a shame, Len. I have a hunch I could take you into an American Legion Hall and have you clear the bar in about seven minutes.

Did you ever make up insulting names for them when they disagree with you. Did you ever make any of the kind of inflammatory statements you're known for--the kind that would be apt to get you knocked on your rump if you'd say them to a man's face?

Oh it is a grand thing, Len. There are little pockets of well-dressed individuals at the old brick lodge hall most evenings. Most gather by the roaring fire, sipping their mulled cider and snickering under their breath.

Get it straight, Leonid: The "gods of radio" thing is your fantasy. You enjoy it and leave me out of it. You never seem to make up your mind which way it goes.

The reason I treat Len with civility is simple, Dave: To do otherwise would be to lower my behavior to his level of immaturity.

Whenever confronted by a differing opinion, Len turns on one or more of the behaviors listed in his profile. In this case, it's name-calling and gender insults. It seems clear he wants the same sort of behavior in reply.

Perhaps it is easier for Len to face a barrage of like insults than it is for him to face his mistakes and immature behavior.

See? Rather than face even the possibility of the problem

Yet Len cannot provide any examples of where I have

Except that you really do make mistakes here, Len. You post things that are simply incorrect, but when those mistakes are pointed out, you attack the person who pointed them out, rather than discuss the issues. That's classic ad hominem.

Consider the following possibility, Dave:

Perhaps Len cannot control his behavior.

I don't claim to be an expert, guru or authority on anything, Len.
But I do know how to spell "authority" correctly.

Since you requested it, here's the latest revision:

"No matter what employment, education, experience or government/military service someone has, if that person disagrees with any of Len's views, or corrects any of Len's mistakes, he/she will be the target of Len's insults, ridicule, name-calling, factual errors,
ethnic/gender/racial slurs, excessive emoticons,
orders to shut up and/or general infantile behavior."

Let's see - so far in this one post, we have Len giving out insults, ridicule, name-calling, gender slurs, and general infantile behavior. Factual errors are probably coming right up.

You know, Dave, perhaps it would be helpful to Len if those responding to his postings here would include the profile, and then note when he acts in accordance with it, using brackets [].

If he doesn't, I'll be happy to. It fits you to a tee.

Not for years, what? That wasn't really a sentence, was it?
>

[factual error]

All it takes to disprove the above claim is to look up any of my discussions with K2UNK, K2ASP, WK3C, K0HB, WA4STJ, WA2ISE, KH6HZ, W5DXP and many others who do not agree with me on the Morse Code test issue, and usually many other things.

>When do you get friendly with someone, Len?

Isn't that clear from Len's behavior? Len defines "friendly" behavior as 100% agreement with anything he says, and never pointing out any of his mistakes or contradictions.

Referring to me as "Jim" or "N2EY" is proper behavior, Len.
Perhaps you are unable to control your behavior.

I also have experience dealing with a wide variety of people.

There's the written tests, Dave. Also the fact that even with an Extra,
Len will be a newcomer and beginner in amateur radio.

[ridicule, factual errors]

>There are times when you write as if you're mentally ill, Leonard.

Len is displaying two common behaviors that the shrinks have names for:
"projection" and "transference".

To paraphrase Wikipedia:

Projection is a defense mechanism in which the individual attributes to other people impulses and traits that he himself has but cannot accept. It is especially likely to occur when the person lacks insight into his own impulses and traits. The individual perceives in others the motive he denies having himself. For example, the cheat is sure that everyone else is dishonest.

When Len rants about feldwebels and mother superiors, he's really talking about his own behavior. When he's going on about titles, rank, etc., or "living in the past", he's really attributing his own motivations and behavior to others.

Note how Len will say I wrote a certain thing, or acted a certain way, or have a certain motivation - but then cannot provide any evidence or proof. That's because he's really talking about his behavior, not mine.

I think Len has accused me of "obsessive compulsive disorder" or some such, because I do post to rrap a lot. Yet a quick glance at google shows that Len posts here even more than I do - even though he is not really involved in amateur radio at all, and I am an active radio amateur.

Pot-kettle => projection

The other common Len behavior is what the shrinks call "transference". It means transfering the feelings associated with one person to a completely different individual, because of some similarity between the two.

For example, Len lumps procodetest people together as if they are all the same, and all responsible for each others' behavior.

Way back in the beginnings of rrap, there was a ham who got the better of Len more than a few times. That particular ham had the same first name as I, was pro-code-test, and held a four-character callsign with 2 in it. He's not posted to rrap regularly for many years.

Seems pretty clear that Len has simply transferred to me
his feelings and unresolved conflicts towards that other Jim.
He can't accept that we are completely different individuals, and that I have nothing to do with what the other fellow wrote
years ago.

Projection and transference, Dave. Explains Len's behavior
here perfectly.

>
> > Maybe the folks in Elsewhen
> > will accept sissies and treat you with "respect."

[etc.]

> Do you think you'll ever be respected in this venue, Len?
>
> > I doubt it but then I've never been to Elsewhen. I > > live in the Present Reality.

Actually, you don't act as if you do, Len. At least not in Objective Reality. You deny your mistakes when they are pointed out. You deny facts that you find unpleasant.

And you simply cannot tolerate any disagreement with your ideas.

> > Here with the rest of > > the residents of Reality, we don't live in a fantasy

> > *F*Y*D*I*T*M*

>I can always count on your to reveal yourself for the horse's > patoot you > are, Len.
>
Dave, consider again that Len may not be able to control his behavior here. Look how perfectly his behavior fits the profile.
Look how perfectly his behavior fits the definitions of "projection" and "transference" - and how furiously he will deny
it, and attack those who point it out.

Perhaps he really can't control himself.

The FYDITM bytebrothers thing, and Len's remarks about bbsing and moderating offer another clue to Len's behavior here.

Len clearly enjoyed those early online days, particularly because he was able to be the moderator and control who could participate.
Anyone who didn't agree with Len's opinions was simply locked out.

But rrap isn't like that. Len keeps trying to shout down or drive off those who disagree with him, and sometimes he is successful. If he can't get them to leave, he tries to get them into an insult exchange, confident that he can out-insult anyone.

What he did not count on was someone who could not be shouted down, driven off, or made to match his behavior here.

btw, I know what the "bytebrothers phrase" means.

As you mentioned, Len won't be around rrap much longer. And there will not be any more code-test NPRMs from FCC for him to comment on.

What will he do without those things?

Don't know. I did a quick lookup of W0EX on QRZ.com to see if his info was still there. W0EX is now assigned to Robert Manly.

The Clergy at the Church of Saint Hiram are probably thrilled that I didn't scoop up that call.

The Clergy at the Church of St. Hiram are Incensed and preparing for an Exorcism. They know it will be a long one, so they are packing their lunches.

appart from it doesn't fit in with the first two. it shouldn't have been part of the madmax franchise. it just doesn't work with regard to the first two.

buckinghamshire just give me day treatment for being bi-polar and having adhd along with a few other mental illnesses when they can be arsed.

now that's me coverd, what's your malfunction?

Oooo! Oooo! It must be Car 54 calling!

No, I am supposed to "come with him to the days of yesteryear and hear the thundering hooves of the great horse, Sliver!" <up theme of the Lone Stranger>

I suppose now you want to talk about "Band Plans of 1941" and how you experienced them? :-)

Tsk, I've never insulted a Messenger. Fine radio from

You don't have a snoot? Tsk.

Okay, let's discuss the "Band Plans of 1941." How was your operating experience on the ham bands then?
I was too young to appreciate the glory and majesty of mighty "CW" in 1941 and want to hear it firsthand from an experienced veteran.

>I'm not anybody's mother.

Tsk. That's a matter of great debate!

>Len, it is you who gets upset from the words written here.

I do? <quizzical look> I thought this was great entertainment?!? Why, in here are all the Greats lecturing on their marvelous experiences of "serving their country" through the service of amateur radio.
I stand in awe before such awesome gods of radio.

Tsk, you've given me all those tees and I wore them
out. Please use better material, okay?

Yawn.

Spanky, spanky!

Please forgive my transgressions on honorifics. I should have said, "Yes, Mother Superior SIR!"

Forgive me, your Most Esteemed Reverence. I transgressed and am ready to accept ex-communication, burning at the stake, giving up all my possessions for failure to Honor, Revere, Love and make Nice-Nice to the Church of St. Hiram.

So, what else is new?

Is this now Professor Higgins? Are you in a different Role-Playing Game now? Or do you think you have an RPG, the other kind (Rocket-Propelled Grenade)? If the latter you've shot yourself in the footsie. Tsk.

Oh, yes, some school in Pennsylvania, right? The one that falsely claimed to have been "first" to "invent
the first electronic computer?"

Ah, but you've NEVER checked my educational background, have you? Never checked much of anything. Tsk.

Oh, my, Davie is all upset over my full-page ads in CQ,
TIME, NEWSWEEK, and the NYT and St. Louis Post-Dispatch
all about my "PROMISE" and "BOAST" seven years ago?

>There's the written tests, Dave. Also the fact that even with an Extra,

Not to mention Plebe, Infant, Kid (snot-nosed knowitall),
Bottom-Feeding Slime, one of those who could Never Know Anything about Anything! Of course. All such minor morons have to be in the back of the room sitting on the floor, saluting and saying SIR! to federally-authorized amateur radio operators!

Radio amateurs have ALWAYS known more, done more, and always far greater than any radio professional for over half a century. Yes, I think you've said that more than once. <deep bow to their majesties>

>Len is displaying two common behaviors that the shrinks have names for:
>"projection" and "transference".

"Projection." Yes, I am taking out my inner, deeper frustrations because my Kodak Carousel PROJECTOR needs
a replacement part that Eastman doesn't stock any more.
I have only a small, portable projector (manual operation) that still works after 55 years! Don't use projectors now...digitized imagery looks just fine on this LCD flat-screen monitor.

"Transference?" Hmmm. Last time I did any transference was helping my wife make a transference of a printer-made decal for a gift to my friend at his surprise birthday party. Fun party for all.

Wikipidia is a recognized definer of psychology? Of course, your supreme doctorate-ness, if you say so, it is SO. Judge Judy has banged her gavel! I hope she gets prompt medical attention from "doctor" Robeson.

>When Len rants about feldwebels and mother superiors, he's >really talking about his own behavior. ...

Oh, dear, more Spanky-Spanky coming up.

Sunnuvagun, Jimmie, just the same I AM glad for you... you got that network job of replacing Dr. Phil on TeeVee and will soon be featured on OPRAH to publicize it. Congratulations! Pop-psych RULES!

Meanwhile, back to internecine warfare as fought by the (Little) Mighty Macho Morsemen...

Look out for Reverend Mother Helen Gaius Mohaim and her dreaded Gom Jabbar, riding to the rescue on her DUNE buggy!*

Mark:

The world is but one large mental hospital, I have heard of no success stories of, even, a single individuals successful escape :(

Here's an exact date, Cecil:

June 10, 1954

On that date, the "Conditional distance" was reduced from 125 miles to 75 miles "air-line" from a quarterly examining point.

Also on that date, FCC stopped giving routine Novice and Technician exams at FCC exam sessions, and instead gave the job to volunteer examiners. After that date, Novice and Technician exams wouyld be done by mail regardless of distance from and FCC exam point.

In those days there were three FCC offices in Texas - Houston, Dallas and Beaumont. Houston and Dallas gave exams on a weekly schedule, while Beaumont was a sub-office that.gave exams by appointment. Exams were also given four times a year in San Antonio.

Of course, in Texas, it's not at all difficult to be more than 75 miles from all four of those offices.

The reason cited for the changes was that the FCC exam sessions were overloaded with amateurs taking the exams, and the FCC had almost overrun its 1953 budget for giving exams. In those days there were no license fees to defray the cost.

This overload happened even though the FCC had stopped giving the Advanced exam 18 months earlier (end of 1952) and there were few applicants for the Extra because that license did not convey any additional operating privileges. Also, the "retest if you move closer" rule had been dropped in 1952, yet the FCC exam sessions were brusting at the seems..

> Thanks again, Jim.

You're welcome, Cecil. Hope that helps pin down the date.

---

btw, in those days the FCC did not give credit for license exam elements previously passed unless they were passed in front of an FCC examiner. If a Novice who had gotten the license by mail went for the Technician, s/he had to do the 5 wpm code again. If a by-mail Technician went for the General or Conditional, s/he had to do the written exam again even though, back then, all three of those license classes used the same written test.

He has at least partial ownership of each of them. (Chung's list of owners is very long, and includes six iterations of my nyms -- but that lits is incomplete, since there're a dozen or so who are "demons", and not on any actual lits.)

That's right...IF and only IF it was W0EX from in here.

But, Jimmie NOserve will probably jump in with his Cranky Spanky and say "that's all wrong" or "you can't be sure" or some other prissy-sissy pedantic nit-picking. :-) [I never said it was proof positive]

The info I gave isn't a full biography since most of the open, free databases don't have full information on a deceased individual. It is good for providing a starting point for those involved in geneaology.

The information seems to fit Carroll's posting dates and their disappearance from the newsgroup...also from what little he revealed of his personal history
and military service times.

If anyone has questions about how the license manual questions and material have evolved through the years, I have the 1938, 1940, 1947, 1955, 1963, 1973, 1974 and 1975 ARRL License manuals and would be happy to field questions.

Did you take out full-page ads in those publications, Len, or is that one of your deliberate distortions of fact. The only person who wrote of a "promise" is you. You told us that you never made a promise and never took a vow. You did make a boast. I'm sure you find your empty words quite embarrassing.

No, Len, you'll be a beginner in amateur radio, a neophyte. I suspect that is one of the real reasons that you'll not obtain a license. You couldn't take being a beginner in amateur radio.

I'm sure that this will come as a surprise to you: All 600+k radio amateurs have never been in the same room, much less having minor morons seated at the back of the room. You could continue to be a beginner from the comfort of your own home.

Who has said that more than once, Len? No one here has said it except you. Having been a radio professional does not give you a pass in obtaining an amateur radio license. You'll have to get yours like the guy who sells shoes or the woman who works in manufacturing.

Well, I must admit, anyone affiliated with the ARRL turns me off, as it does many. Although they cannot, possibly, be held directly and solely responsible for bringing amateur radio to the brink of disaster it now hangs at, they certainly have never helped much, well, other than themselves.

However, I would strongly suggest anyone to investigate all of the options open to an Indian reservation, the laws which govern them are much different than those governing all other areas of the USA. If I read that paper correctly (mentioned in my earlier post), the FCC would seem to be mostly interested in the rf which left the borders of the reservation.

I know ripples of shock went through the population of California when they were allowed to operate gambling casinos. Something most did not expect.

I would not be surprised if further surprises along those same line do not await us ...

Now, as to the rest, I am simply not impressed nor interested ...

Mark, thank you (maybe)...but I was "on the air"
several years ago. Broadcasting stuff. In Los Angeles...as well as in Illinois. I'm used to it and have no qualms about speaking to tens of thousands at the same time.

That was entertainment for others. For some pay. Amateur radio has NO pay. It should be done for its own sake. But, I'm really not that interested in just talking about ham gear, ham events, ham this or ham that...which seems to occupy 98.6% of the voice convos on HF. VHF

and UHF, local stuff, is much more appealing because it has the variety that human beings
have...those humans not building their lives around their HF radios and How Good They Are At Morse Code.

The red-hatted morse monkey seems to be stuck on absolute, supreme Teutonic Formality. Thou shalt transmit JUST SO und dose are orderss! <he said, spitting out the last through clenched, snarly lips>

Teutonic? Or Two-tonnic? Hard to say.

Poor guy just can't let what little is left of his hair down and be human. Alvays das Teuton!

"Achtung! Yu VILL stand schtill vile I take aim to kill yu!!!" :-) Fat chance, Woe Fat. :-)

["Book 'em, Danno" ... :-)]

I have to give him some credit at trying to be human. That cute little red-hat he wears gives him something of jaunty air. Of course the old threadbare Waffen SS uniform on the rest of him is way too old and doesn't fit. It's a start.

Poor guy has NO idea of what I'm talking about if I mention "Dune" or Frank Herbert. Certainly not about the Bene Gesserit. One of the premier, award-winning novels in science fiction
in the last century.

His mind is locked into those ARRL publications, like License Manuals going back to 1938. Fine for rare and unusual book collectors. But this IS the year 2007 and perhaps the greatest, earth-shattering thing
in US amateur radio will happen in February.
Old License Manuals are now de rigeur for discussion among the morse monkeys. Denial, of course. Most of them refuse to acknowledge the fact that code testing is ending, want to keep AWAY from the subject. Code was their LIFE.
Like trolls hiding under bridges, the morse
monkeys have to creep away into little enclaves
of olden times when they were somebodies...
who could strut around, being arrogantly condescending and Giving Orders! Tsk.

Not to worry. Cranky spanky will be here promptly at 6:30 AM Eastern to issue one of his Encyclicals. He will grind his organ and the little red-hatted morse monkeys will dance.

Such "policy fun." NOT

LA

That must be the worst thing you could use to curse someone.
Have you had a bad experience lately again, of course none...

Damn, Len. You are up late! Still stalking Dave?
Life must be boring in the Land of Druggies and Liberals.
Obviously, at your age, you aren't out running with the kids..so that relegates you to the Doddering Old Man category wherein you and your Archie Bunker types are left comparing notes on whose cholostomy bags hold the most scat before bursting.

Thank you, Sir Len for the time you take to grace us with your <wink wink> "humor" .

Good luck on obtaining an Amateur Radio license...<chortle>

Ah, the condescension...the humor that is not.

Len's humor is not humor, tho he percieves it to be so.

And while you are busy "pitying" us of lesser intellect and polishing Lenny's boots, take a look around you.

It may well be US who pity you...

Len is a clown....entertain him as such. He is nothing more, nothing less.

Play with him. Allow him his attempts at humor. It is all he has.

In North Carolina, all one has to do to renew drivers licenses is an eye examination, test for color blindness, and go through the road signs to tell the examiner what the various signs mean. The only time you have to take the written test or drivers test is if you have had a moving violation since your last license issue date.

I agree completely. The test pools appear to be adequate. For the most part the new hams I have observed appear to be capable of making that first contact and improve as they gain experience. It's a safe and fun hobby that has practical application during times of emergency or national need. My experience has been that, when asked, they will make the sacrifice of time and personal equipment during disasters to provide that essential common radio communications between various federal and state organizations who cannot communicate directly with each other via radio. IMO, having more hams at the current level of standards is a good thing.

the dr who christmas special sucked arse as catherine tate was a very bad choice for the brides character in it. she's to well known for her hilarious comic creations and that is all i could see with regard to her.

i like the new daleks, they're cool. the new cybermen are total shite and look like they escaped out of a bad 1950's or 60's sci fi comic.

So that would be a resounding "YES!", then.

That seems to be the case with most, if not all, states in the USA. In California the DMV has a "study guide" free in printed form, PDF download, or HTML perusal on-line for its written test. I did mine a couple years ago and it was comprehensive. No qualms, no anxiety, just kicking myself mentally for missing ONE question that was obvious as to what the correct answer should have been. :-)

Interesting to note all the remarks some make about "needing"
real equipment to operate and a good simulation of station environment. That's comparable to the driver's license road test where an inspector rides along observing-directing as one is out in traffic. Not a "simulation" but the REAL thing.
Yet MOST states have dropped that road test, satisfied with the written test...plus the eye quick-check, new-legislation-
since-last-tested quickie quiz, and some other subtle clues
the clerks observe to find out if a person is "with it." :-)

Operating a ton or two of moving machinery in the midst of other moving machinery on a street or road is FAR MORE HAZARDOUS to both operator and anyone nearby. Yet most states have dropped doing that sort of testing except, as you note, moving violations have been done or just requiring a ten-plus year period of such retesting. That's for practical reasons NOT bounded on the cost of maintaining road driving inspectors but more like the following:

1. Most drivers doing testing are NOT (generally) trying to kill themselves or anyone else in the near future...they will be needing an automobile for regular transportation and have enough common sense to follow driving laws and procedure to keep that ability.

2. Most DMV (or state equivalent) testing offices-locations are some distance from a testee's residence and/or place of work. They have used their vehicle to get to the test area, itself a form of "being able to operate a vehicle." Exceptions of first-license applicants are just exceptions and a minority - they MUST have the road test in most states. California used to be nit-picky about new residents bearing another states' drivers license: in 1956 I had to take a road test despite having held an Illinois license since 1950 (was "becoming a resident by accepting employment here"). That may still be in force but irrelevant.

3. In my infrequent observations of California DMV offices, there's been no change of the number of road test inspectors nor of facilities and they have made the same number of free guides and information for the public. Plus, they've implemented the photo ID and now issue license cards with holographic impressions and a magnetic data stripe on them. This state, like most states, has a computer data network on drivers licenses as well as identified vehicles. The cost of all those things has increased budget requirements, not decreased them. Much of that has been to aid police departments since vehicular operation CAN, and unfortunately does lead to fatal incidents.

In comparison to the amateur radio hobby, there really isn't much. Operation of a hobby radio seldom results in any fatality. Of course, any amateur may make stupid mistakes and off themselves but home accidents happen to all humans and aren't related to amateur radio licensing. The RF safety regulations have always been questionable to me (I've dug into comprehensive medical studies of such things done by the USAF by medical researchers). Much of today's "RF Safety" regulations seem to be the result of legislative hysteria based on such "dangerous" sources of radiation as HVAC power lines, cell phones, and microwave ovens. :-)

To have "practical amateur radio station operation" as a test is in the realm of the highly impractical. For one thing there is little standardization in form-fit-function or control of desk-mount transceivers...except for a single brand's model series. Desk-mount transceivers share very few common controls with compact, multi-function handheld two-way radios. Compare any ready-built ham transceiver of this brand-new century with any available in, say, 1960

and there is a world of difference in technology between them. On the other hand, basic automobile operational controls have only varied slightly in the last half century, including instrumentation. Steering wheel, gearshift, speedometer, lights, turn-signals, accelerometer, brake pedal are all there today as they were in 1950. Only the clutch as a basic control has all but disapperared with the automatic transmission (the gearshift remains although its function settings are different).

I looked into www.ncvec.org to refresh my memory. There's only ONE graphic file there and that for Extra. Seems to be covering the FCC regulations as well as the California
DMV does its Motor Vehicle Code questions.

>For the most >part the new hams I have observed appear to be capable of making that first >contact and improve as they gain experience.

I can't comment much on that since my "first contact" on real radio was back in 1952 in training at Fort Monmouth, NJ. :-) Very strict protocol observance, of course. The Army was not a hobby activity, just involved in a skill set of DESTROYING an enemy with self-survival a plus. :-)
The next three years of active duty was more of the same with a much bigger, more complex set of "radios."

Much later as a civilian and taking flying lessons, I had NO problem operating an aircraft radio, using Civil Aviation flying jargon and FAA procedures. That seemed to really piss off one of my two instructors. Apparently he wanted to play control-freak in constantly berating me for being such a newbie dummy. The other one kept insisting I needed that 3rd Class (Restricted) Radio-telephone License (no test required) to "be lawful." Had to explain to VNY Skyways CEO that my First 'Phone (then 6 years since issuance) was quite lawful and had to get an FAA tower man at VNY to back me up. Skyways had the temerity of billing me the usual 1-hour rate of $17.50
I spent NOT in flying lessons but instead arguing with folks who supposedly "knew better." I quit that flying thing for various other reasons afterwards although lack of spare money at the time was primary motivator. :-)

It's been my life experience that MOST citizens will voluntarily help out others in REAL emergencies, whether or not they know how to operate a radio. Having been IN a couple of REAL emergencies locally, I have yet to experience first-hand any flurry of amateur activity to "aid organizations who cannot communicate directly via radio." During one of those REAL emergencies I've found that the existing organizations were quite adequately prepared...and drilled and trained on emergencies WITH their equipment and worked-out emergency plans that weren't public-relations news releases.

>IMO, having more hams at the current level of standards is >a good thing.

For the hobby, I'll agree with you. For the electronics industry it won't make a dent either way...and it won't much change the REAL Public Safety organizations in a few urban government structures who've already had their emergency plans proven by the REAL thing.

On the other hand, as a resident of the Center of Film and TV production city of Los Angeles, CA, I have the displeasure of being close to the show biz elite who produced such "documentaries" as "Independence Day."
Still, I'm not worried about Alien Invaders from Outer Space or whether or not there are enough morsemen to "Save the World" with their intrepid morse skills...:-)

Best regards,
LA

Actually, I don't. I am simply TRYING to discuss some issues that MIGHT later effect me. There is NO
"discussion" in here, just the usual power-play of the control-freaks trying to drive out "undesirable" opponents. The Gods of Beeping Raddio MUST Rule.

I neither "pity" them nor feel much of anything about them. They simply ARE...like skeeters and chiggers.

Their models have existed for all recorded history of mankind. As you say, LITTLE men trying to be bigger than they really are...attempting to control and direct

Shrug. They are to be tolerated is all. When they are gone, others will take their place and be as LITTLE.

You know you and I stand in the circle of agreement, rather than outside.

A wise man will hear your words and "know them", or else "put 'em on the back burner" for later thought.

What others would do? Well, that is the example being posed before you,
here.

To Whom It May Concern:

Let us take a little bit better look at this ï¿½unwritten policyï¿½ here, see if we can make any logical analysis about itï¿½get the ï¿½feelï¿½ for it,
if you will.

First, there are quite a bit of threads which make up the rec.radio.amateur.??? ï¿½family of threadsï¿½:
rec.radio.amateur.antenna
rec.radio.amateur.boatanchors
rec.radio.amateur.digital.misc
rec.radio.amateur.dx rec.radio.amateur.equipment
rec.radio.amateur.homebrew rec.radio.amateur rec.radio.amateur.misc
rec.radio.amateur.packet

Do you see one which is close to say ï¿½rec.radio.amateur.new-licensees?ï¿½
Or, ï¿½rec.radio.amateur.license .help?ï¿½ "rec.radio.amateur.recruitment?"

No, you will not find a one. Sorry thing ï¿½

So, let us examine the existing threads, do any seem to be active in new recruitment/licence help? No, you donï¿½t see much of that either.

OK. So, examine them again, see may of these threads engaged in dialog about how to recruit and spark interest in potential-new licensees? No, not much of that either ï¿½

Hmmm, so what do we see?

We see a bunch of protective, selfish, self-serving individuals out to protect their ï¿½turf!ï¿½

Now, why donï¿½t we have more ï¿½new-bloodï¿½ here? What, speak up, I canï¿½t seem to hear you?

Well, Iï¿½ll make one exception, Dee, she has expressed some desire,
willing to attempt and willingness towards the above.

What we really have is a bunch of these "high-mighty-self-centered-jerks" attempting to get their new club house built and escape there firmly shutting the door behind them, so as to BAR any of the above from occurring.

Or, as Cecil would say, SWEET!

And you doubt Len? Really?

Regards,
JS

I do as well although I tend to work more one on one have helped launch about 8 hams derectly and the end of Code testing will certainly help me with the sorts of pitch I like to make

The first two would fall under rec.radio.amateur.misc, unless there was adequate demand to justify creation of a sub-group, which there isn't, from what I've seen.

Help could be many things, if you needed antenna help there is a group called .antenna, if you wanted homebrew help you could ask in .homebrew.

.misc is the "catch all" for discussions which are not applicable elsewhere. Since there is next to zero discussions concerning new licenses or help in .misc, we can only conclude there is zero demand for such a group.

The 3rd probably isn't relevant at all, since you're not very likely to do much recruiting on USENET. Google Amateur Radio and your first hit is the ARRL.

Although I can see a few quirks here and there, I would have to say that overall the testing, requirements, and methods have improved over the years, rather than regressed. I had to chuckle at some of the early stuff, which was awkward, and most arbitrary. Some of those tests amounted to "open book" tests, which are surely easier than Open pool tests.

Certainly if there were only a few exams existing for the different levels, it would be very important to be hush-hush about the contents of those exams. It certainly would argue against those few tests being so much superior.

I think it obvious, the new amateur is not going to tolerate the ARRL, many of the old ones couldn't ... I think even the ARRL has seen that written on the wall.

If you are not going to recruit from the internet, where, the dum-dums on the football field? Bars? Churches? Parks? The homeless?

I am afraid the new crowd will need to come from here ... but hey, that is only one mans' opinion.

I understand what you say here Jim, but I don't agree. If a person can go to the trouble of learning Morse code, they should be able to go to the trouble of traveling to the FCC exam points. I can't imagine that a peron who went to the trouble of learning the material would feel otherwise.

I travelled about 120 mikes fro my Tech, about 300 for my General written CSCE, a mere 20 for my Element 1, and aroud 70 for my Extra.

Just for grins, Mike, make the applicant 12-14 years of age. Put him in a family with one automobile where the father works during the day and the mother doesn't drive.

The nearest examination point when I was a kid would have been better than 50 miles each way, in a time before there was an Interstate Highway anywhere nearby. The journey each direction would have taken at least an hour-and-a-half over two lane mountain roads. The examination point was one of those which the FCC visited quarterly.

they should not be under copyright anymore if they ever were most of them would have belong the US Govt not the but the copyrigh t would run out on the arrl material by now on basical all of that materail
